(c) The business done will be exactly in proportion to the amount that people want and are able to pay for. If one wants $100 worth of clothes and can pay for them, the clothier and he will do just that amount of business. If not, then they will do less, and similarly with all other transactions.

(d) Business is "helped" when the demand for articles is increased, when the ability to pay for them is made greater, and when the production of them is made easy and cheap. Business is "injured" when the demand is lessened, the ability to pay diminished, and the cost of production increased.

In the foregoing principles, the following propositions are clearly of the utmost importance:

1 The dram shop decreases the demand for legitimate articles of trade. The great staples of trade are what is eaten, worn or used to live in and work with. If the dram shop really "helps" business it must make people eat more, wear more, and use more buildings and tools. But experience proves the very reverse of this to be true. It is the work of the dram shop to teach men to tipple and drink, and the less as a rule, they are able to purchase in the way of food, clothes, houses, and implements. The demand for drink increases, and must be satisfied though the family goes without the requisite supply of bread, clothes and the usual comforts of home. As the dram shop gets hold of a man—the provider for a family—the baker and butcher, the grocer and clothier, the tinsmith and bookseller, and all traders sell less and less. The bottle is sent out for whisky where formerly the basket went for bread and meat.

Suppose a trader has a full variety store, and has fifty sober working men with families for his customers. These will spend on an average $300 each with the trader, and so he will do a business of $15,000 per year. Now let the dram shop come, and teach all those to tipple and drink. Will the fifty tippling workmen take more or as much from the trader's store as they did when sober? Nay, but they will now spend on an average $50 a year in the dram shop, and therefore have not $250 to spend with the trader, and his business shrinks from $15,000 to $12,500. The dram shop lessens the demand for the trader's wares and increases the demand for strong drink. The dram shop is therefore, a constant and deadly enemy to business, inasmuch as always and inevitably it decreases the demand for the legitimate articles of trade.

2 The dram shop decreases the purchasing capacity of the people. It is quite plain that the purchasing capacity of a community is measured by its earning power. How then does the dram shop effect the earning power of a community?

The first result of the dram is to cause loss of time, and idleness. Men spend hours at tippling, when they ought to be at work. Men pass days in spasms and "strunks," when they ought to be at their trade. Men lose situations on account of drinking, and are for days and weeks without employment, and earning nothing. Suppose in a town you have two hundred workingmen, earning $1.50 per day. Their aggregate earnings are $300 per day, or $1,800 per week. Now, if dram shops are set up in this town, and one half of the workers learn to tipple and drink, and lose on an average one day per week, the earnings amount to $150 less per week, or $7,800 less per year. In Great Britain it is estimated that the labor power loses one day in every six on account of drunkenness.

Whence come the loungers and loafers, and tramps that congregate on our streets, or roam our country? They are nine cases out of ten, the idle graduates of the dram shop.

Whence come the hosts of "drunk and disorderlies," who not only do not earn earn, but who live at the expense of earners, in our jails and prisons? Why are these not at work? The dram shops have ruined them, and turned them from earners into non-earners.

Whence come the violent, abusive, thieves, vagrants and murderers? Official statistics tell us that seventy-five per cent of them are the result of drink, and the dram shop is the mill in which drink grinds down its victims from honest, sober, orderly, and industrious citizens into criminals of every grade. Close the dram shops, keep people sober and industrious, and the earning power, and with it the trade of the country would be vastly increased.

Step by step the leading food products of Europe are being reproduced in this country. Macaroni is made by Italians in New York. Neuchatel cheese by Swiss in New Jersey, Schweizer kase by Germans in Ohio, Albert biscuit by Englishman in Albany, and caviare by Russians in Harlem. Nearly all of these are exported to Europe, and there sold as domestic manufactures.

Scientific Miscellany.

In a paper recently read before the Paris Academy of Medicine the opinion was expressed that one person in every 5,000 was buried alive.

The Russian phylloxera plant, or "vellow herb," possesses a fiber which enthusiasts think may in time be so improved as to take the place of cotton in Russia.

A growth forming a scum upon a pond near Complelton, New South Wales, has been noticed to have a rich green color in the mornings, turning to a deep red in the afternoons.

Mr. E. E. Fish has given evidence tending to show that birds have a keen perception of color and love for artistic arrangements of colors, and a strong susceptibility to musical melodies.

A Vienna scientist has noticed that the workmen at the petroleum wells of Galicia enjoy perfect immunity from cholera, and he infers that petroleum vapor acts as a preventive of the disease.

The oldest reference thus far discovered to phenomena resembling the sunsets of 1883 appears to be an account of similar appearances found by a German meteorologist in a Danish work of 1570.

Japan's meteorological system now comprises twenty-three observatories in the most important places throughout the country. From each district three weather reports daily are sent to the central observatory at Tokio, where they are prepared for publication by the leading journals of the seaports.

With glass plates coated with sulphuret of calcium, Mons. Gustave Herpaine obtains phosphorescent photographs. The exposure is made under a strong light, and the picture is very distinct when the plate is taken into the dark. It may be revived afterward by breathing upon the plate and then pressing a hot thermometer over it.

The judicious planting of eucalyptus trees has been recommended by Baron Von Mueller as a means of increasing and maintaining the water supply of Australia. These trees—known also as the "blue gum" trees—are credited with remarkable powers of collecting and absorbing water, and of condensing into water the moisture in the air.

Parts of an ancient human skull have been found by Dr. M. Barvera in a hard siliceous limestone near the border of lake Texcoco, Mexico. The limestone, whose origin is unknown, is covered with a deposit made by the water of the lake, and it is evident that since the entombment of the skull both the rock and the material above it have been elevated several feet—probably to the eruption which projected an eruptive hill near the locality.

A plan of accurately measuring the temperature of a distant station by telephone has been described by Dr. R. Lenz. Two wires—one of silver and one of iron, or one of antimony and one of bismuth—connect the observer with the distant place, and any variations in the end loops of the wires as regards temperature causes a sound in a telephone, when causes wires the temperature at the observer's loop is brought to the same point as that of the opposite end—which may be miles away.

Oxygen Cheaply Liquified.—In a note to the French Academy of Sciences, Mons. Cailletet has communicated a plan for producing liquid oxygen which is so simple that it is expected that the product may soon become an article of commerce, as liquefied carbonic acid now is in Germany. He states that when the gas known as formene is slightly condensed and cooled in boiling ethylene under atmospheric pressure, it is resolved into an extremely volatile colorless fluid, and this fluid, in returning to a gaseous state, yields a degree of cold sufficient to immediately liquefy oxygen.

An assignment has been made at Racine, Wis., by the J. I. Case Plow Company to Charles H. Lee, attorney for the J. I. Case Threshing-Machine Works. The nominal value of the assets is $600,000, and the liabilities are estimated at between $750,000 and $800,000. Apart from the indebtedness of the company to Mr. Case, the preferred claims amount to less than $20,000. The firm owes Mr. Case individually $625,000.

A dispatch from Daggett, Cal., says a mob of twenty men surrounded the officers in charge of William Pitts, charged with having clubbed David Harris to death with a wagon-spoke on the night of the 15th inst. The men told the officers to keep perfectly quiet and there would be no trouble. They then marched Pitts to the outskirts of the town, put a rope around his neck, and threw the other end over the cross-arm of a telegraph pole, and hoisted him up. He was dead in a few minutes. Pitts was a deserter from the United States army.

Charles Stevens, alias "Omaha Charley," a desperado, was taken from jail at Maryville, Mo., by a mob, and hanged to the railway bridge. In the skirmish between the sheriff and his deputies and the lynchers, one of the latter was dangerously wounded.

In front of the new City Hall at San Francisco, Daniel Kenearly was killed by his wife with a revolver.

Reuben B. Springer, the Cincinnati philanthropist, died suddenly at his house in that city.

Henry Bells, residing at South Bend, Ind., undertook to break material fever by starving himself. He lived on water alone for thirty-four days, when he died, saying that he was induced to take a spoonful of beef tea.

WASHINGTON.

The annual report of William E. Chandler, Secretary of the Navy, has been quietly put in connection with the statement of the Secretary of the Navy, has been officially launched, the Secretary says it has been shown that American steel makers can furnish armor and armor-plate for the new ironclad, and that the Secretary says it has been shown that American steel makers can furnish excellent armor-plate for the ironclad, being in large quantities. The Secretary points out that experiments of great labor, the new armors and the great transatlantic steamships, are satisfactory because the interests their high speed only to the question of qualities essential to a ship of war, and adds that the former will increase 40 per cent. of the merchant steamers of the world. The report calls attention to the necessity for import duties, and recommends the continuance for one year of modern workers annually for the next ten years. Commenting on the present condition of the navy, Secretary Chandler says that the disproportion between the expenditures therefor, and the sum actually produced, is due to the policy of attempting at great cost to rehabilitate worn-out structures under the name of repairs. The report recommends the discontinuance of several navy-yards and workshops and certain improvements in the management of the remaining, among these the exclusion of politics, recites the history of the recent secret expedition, comments at length upon the frauds connected with the Bureau of Medicine and Surgery, lays the ordinary estimates at $17,750,000, and those for increasing the navy at $15,971,900, and, in conclusion, advocates Government encouragement for the development of American marine, either in the shape of bounties or mail subsidies, or payment for carrying the mails.

The marble capstone and pyramidal apex of Washington Monument were set in place upon the Washington Monument on Saturday, the 5th of December, completing the tallest structure in the world erected by human hands. The ceremonies were quite simple, the great exhibition being reserved for Washington's birthday. As soon as the capstone was set the national flag was spread upon the breeze at a height of 500 feet, a battery of guns in the White House fired a salute, and the people on the pavilion sent up a cheer above the ground saw the "Star-Spangled Banner." The Washington Monument Society, immediately acted on the platform adopted a resolution congratulating the American people "on the completion of an enduring monument of our Nation's great history in the Father of his Country."

The United States Supreme Court has affirmed the constitutionality of the act of Congress forbidding upon vessels from foreign ports a tax of $1.00 for each passenger who is not a citizen, the money to be used in taking care of immigrants.

Senator John Sherman favors the stoppage of the coinage of the silver dollar, or else making it 412 grains, instead of 412½, which would raise it to a gold standard and make it passable throughout the world. If this change were made, Mr. Sherman states that he believes the effect on trade would be magical.

Senator Blair thinks that the Colored People's Exposition, to be held in Chicago next year, will be a great thing for the race, and that it is the duty of the Government to help the enterprise along.

President Arthur telegraphed the Board of Management of the New Orleans Exposition he would not be able to be present at the opening, but would visit it some time in January.

POLITICAL.

Senator Edmunds talks of retiring from public life at the end of his present term in the Senate, and expresses much annoyance at the criticism of Vermont Republicans newspapers for his refusal to take part in the late campaign.

It is said that after Mr. Cleveland's resignation of the Gubernatorial office he will extend an invitation to the Democratic party leaders to visit him in Buffalo. The most prominent Southern aspirants for Cabinet portfolios are Henry of Mississippi, Garland of Arkansas, and Barbour of Virginia. The west have dropped out.

Wade Hampton has been re-elected senator from South Carolina, receiving 4 votes in the Legislature except those of five colored men.

Washington telegram: "Senator Tiden, F. Bayard made a secret visit to Albany last Saturday night, arrive there in the morning and, remaining at the executive mansion until the following afternoon, when he returned to Washington. The Senator's visit to the President-elect was carefully guarded. Secrecy until yesterday, when it leaked out, and to-day it was the interesting topic in political circles. It is believed that the office of Secretary of State was offered to Mr. Bayard by the President, but whether he accepted it is left a matter of conjecture as whether the Governor saw the President will generally do the information in relation to the matter. There is, however, reason to believe that the President-elect followed the example of Lincoln, and brought his best Democratic opponent in the national convention with the hopes of Secretaryship."

A Washington correspondent of the Chicago Times says:

"There were quite numerous visits to the Cleveland mansion during the week, and the Democrats who came thither were those who are prominently in Bayard, who was the Democratic candidate for President, and proposed to that had been made to Mr. Bayard, the Secretaryship. "Think it over," and it will not take you long, either. It is not necessary to deal with us by inference in yesterday's Sentinel reflected to the editor of the JOURNAL. As an individual our record is consistently in favor of practical, effective work, and without intemperance or otherwise. And we shall never knowingly abuse or insult any man or woman who disagrees with us. We believe in allowing the largest possible liberty to press, stench, and opinions, and would give the people a chance to express their opinions unbiased by personal or partisan dictation. Whether the editor of the Sentinel has always favored the right is best told by those who have known him longest. If he is proud of it, let it stand.

We understand that E. J. Meech's house in Norwood came very near being destroyed by fire last Sunday morning, through the carelessness of the proprietor. We believe in preserving the purity of the ballot box and other things, but did not suppose it was necessary to hold up the whole business in order to secure that end, and hope Bro. Meech will be a little more careful of his torch in the future.

He will be glad to give information in regard to her arrangements for the next season. Enterprise.

Scarlet Fever and Diphtheria.

These diseases are prevailing to some extent, and are dangerous to the public health. To prevent their spread every case should be isolated from the public, and immediate notice given to the proper health officer. The law on this subject is as follows:

SECTION 586, ST. Whenever any householder, hotel keeper, keeper of a boarding house or lodging house, or shall have reason to believe, that any person in his lodgings, hotel, boarding house, or premises is taken sick with small-pox, cholera, diphtheria, scarlet fever, or any other disease dangerous to the public health, he shall immediately give notice thereof to the health officer, the president, or the clerk of the board of health of the township, city, or village in which he resides. Said notice shall state the name of the person sick, the name of the disease, the number of the householder, hotel keeper, keeper of boarding house or lodging house, giving the street and house number, or otherwise, sufficiently to indicate the premises which he occupies or the room in which the sick person may be; and if he shall refuse or neglect immediately to give such notice he shall forfeit for each such offence a sum not exceeding one hundred dollars: Provided, That this penalty shall not be enforced if a physician in attendance has given to the health officer or other officer his evidence upon reasonable or immediate notice of said sick person, and the true cause of the disease, in accordance with the requirements of this section.

Historical Society.

The society held a brief session Tuesday evening listening only to Mrs. Cook's excellent paper, and adjourning early to allow the ladies to attend the surprise party at Mr. Buttars'.

A PLEASANT SURPRISE.

Large Gathering of Friends to Say Good Bye to Lieutenant Governor-elect Buttars.

It having been announced that Lieutenant Governor Buttars would in a few day close his house and go to Lansing to remain until the close of the session of the legislature, a surprise party was planned for Tuesday evening, to give his many friends an opportunity to bid him good-bye. The place and hour of gathering was fixed at the Bridge Street house at 8:30, and the Historical society which held its session there, adjourned in time to bend the party. The night was fearful stormy, but enough attended to completely fill the house.

Archie was found in his shirt sleeves and "old clothes," and seemed astonished to meet so many people there at that hour. But he was not long in making them all comfortable.

E. H. Green called the house to order, and suggested that, in the absence of the president or president pro tem of the village, some one be selected as master of ceremonies. He was promptly named for the place. A program had been prepared as follows:

Music, by the Glee Club.

Opening address, by E. H. Green As president of the historical society, he extended the congratulations of the society, on the election of a member of that body to the second highest office in the gift of the state of Michigan.

Oath of office administered by W. A. Smith, notary public.

A. D. Cruickshank responded to the sentiment, "the democracy," referring in a happy manner to the fact that no matter how bitter the partisanship before election, after it is settled all join in wishing the victor a pleasant and prosperous term of office.

The needs of the medical profession was discussed by Dr. Carlstein.

Miss Orser and Mr. Bradlaugh gave a musical selection.

Fred W. Mayne pointed out the relations between Mr. Buttars and the legal fraternity and suggested that he deal gently with them.

As an old resident Robert Miller recalled many incidents in the life of Mr. Buttars during his stay in Charlevoix.

"The press" was responded to by W. A. Smith.

Mr. Buttars having been a merchant in his early days here, E. M. Clark discussed his relationship to that business.

In discussing "the republican party" Dr. Graves gave a characteristic republican address.

On behalf of the church Rev. J. T. Iddings advised a constant recollection of Mr. Buttars' position in the church, and a doubling of laws at all times to meet the requirements of people as Christians.

Mr. Buttars made a feeling response to the addresses, touching the many misgivings he has had during the campaign and since the election; and promising on his part to endeavor to merit the continued good will of his fellow citizens.

After another selection by the Glee Club, the company made themselves comfortable for a short time, when another august body—the masonic fraternity—helped to pack the already crowded parlors. In behalf of that body A. R. Dwight W. M. made a brief address, to which Mr. Buttars made response, thanking them for their presence on this occasion.

The best wishes of our people go with Mr. Buttars during his sojourn in Lansing.

Favorable Indications.

The Chattanooga, Tenn. stove works employing 75 men, resumed work Friday.

The Hill and Continental cotton mills, at Lewiston, Me., resumed work with a full force Friday.

Nearly all the cotton and woolen mills in Lewiston, N. H., are running full time at the old wages.

The extensive sewing machine works at Plattsburg, N. Y. will start shortly with a full force. The Plattsburg blast furnace will be run this winter.

Shoenberger & Co.'s two large iron mills, at Pittsburg, Pa., which have been closed for some time, started up on full time recently in all department, giving employment to 600 hands. The firm has sufficient orders to keep running steadily.

The Schuylkill Haven Rolling Mill, above Port Clinton, Pa., employing over 100 men which had been idle since last August, resumed Tuesday.

All the cotton factories in Columbus, Ga., one excepted, are running full time and have advanced the prices of goods. The plaid mills are all full of orders and business is brightening.

After a stoppage of several weeks Russell & Co., of Massillon, O., employing 550 men in the manufacture of agricultural machinery, have resumed work at a ten per cent reduction of wages of employes.

The striking hatters in South Norwalk, Conn are confident of winning. The co-operative hat manufacturing association will build a factory since. The capital has been increased from $5,000 to $10,000.

The Hocking Valley strike seems practically at an end. Many of the old men to-day offered to go to work, thus breaking the lines. The others wants a compromise at 60 cents, with the privilege of returning in the union.

The general feeling among business men at Pittsburg, is daily growing more hopeful. Some large orders for railroad supplies have this week been placed with manufacturers and big orders have been asked for. The feeling among the iron men is decidedly better on account of the receipt of fair orders for the product of the mills.

Card of Thanks.

In behalf of myself and others whose property was saved by the saving of my wagon shop, I desire to thank all whose efforts were directed toward saving the building, stock and adjoining property.

D. C. NETTLETON.

True Appreciation.

The observation of a great writer on having half a dozen copies of beauty sent him by an anonymous admirer is worth quoting. "Good or ill, my complacency, "is true fame." For my part, as it only in accordance with the rules of proportion, I have had to be content with a mere mortar liquefacere gingerbeer, a dress which is differencesd, no doubt, but scarcely less refreshing enough. I once had a Persian cat, which (I had almost written "who") was very dear to me, and went to a suburban poison office for professional advice as to annoints and towards. "What is your name, sir?" inquired the intelligent inspector (it is cynically observed that inspectors are always called in the newspapers "intelligent," but this one, as will be seen, fully deserved the title.) As my business was a lawful one, I of course, gave him no alias. "James Pupf" he echoed. "Are you the storekeeper?" I modestly murmured that I was. "Then I tell you what," he said, in a tone in which generosity and gratitude were finely blended, "you are one of my district, but I'll take the cat." And he took it. That was my trade. I have also had scraps of money borrowed of me at various times; as mirrors of my promise—but that has given me less satisfaction.—James Payn in the Cornhill Magazine.

Voodooism.

The Voodoos of Louisiana—those negroes who still make the eve of St. John an orgy of wierd incantations were recently viewed at the fingers of a negress, one of the Queens of Voodooism, in a shanty not far from a lunatic garb. On her head was a garland of bay leaves, while about her neck a dead snake was twined. The fitful light from a bunch of resinous pine cast a smoky glare over a hundred negroes, who, with joined hands, sat on the ground and swayed their bodies back and forth to the rythm of a monotonous drawling song, every one letting out an unearthly scream, the same a moron by tremulous groans. The incense were strewed on the ground, and a dance was given of the most riper that before it could many of the dancers had fallen from sheer exhaustion. Then the chief of the dead women were thrown into the grave, one garment at a time, leaving them being torn in two before being cast in.

France is not prosperous. Allowing for the million and a half taken away by Germany, the population has made no progress at all since 1866. Its numbers are smaller now than they were fifteen years ago, while the load of taxation has almost doubled—its imports have much more than doubled. Equally stationary has been its export trade. The average of recent years has failed been lower than for the years immediately succeeding the war. Imports have, on the other hand, augmented much, but not because the country has been universally prosperous. The increase is the consequence of bad harvests, and indicates a further diminution of the wealth of the people.

It is said the New York Herald has spent $173,000 fighting the newsboys.

BRIGHT BLAZES.

A Row of Wooden Buildings Totally Destroyed.

Last Monday morning at 4 o'clock an alarm of fire was given, and our citizens awoke to find W. S. Johnson's boarding house a mass of flame, and the adjoining buildings beyond control. The inmates of the boarding house escaped in their night clothes, losing everything. By the hard work of our citizens, and the fortunate absence of wind, other contiguous buildings were saved, although numerous occupants moved out, or prepared to do so. Nettleton's wagon shop and Joslyn Bro's barn were most exposed, but escaped, hitched work saved them.

H. W. Jefferies loses in stock, tools, accounts, etc., about $1,000, with no insurance.

J. Milo Eaton loses building occupied by above, about $300, no insurance.

W. S. Johnson loses building and contents, $1,200 to $1,600, with $700 insurance.

Miss Ella Barry, daughter of Mrs. Johnson, lost clothing, money, and gold watch. She claimed from a pool of the tornado, and ran barefooted through the snow nearly two blocks, to a W. Sock's residence.

Mr. Johnson's boarders lost all their effects.

The building occupied by Fraser's band and their stock was of little value. The Sun stock was partially removed, and the box is believed to be fully covered by insurance.

Louis Cohen loses on barn and contents, from $400 to $500, about $200, with no insurance.

Nothing definite is known of the origin of the fire, but circumstance indicate incendiarism.

NOTES.

Already the work of rebuilding begins.

Louis Cohen is well along toward completion.

The young's drawer at the Bridge Street House was called during the excitement, and about 50 taken.

J. Sock's force pump did excellent work for Mr. Johnson's wagon shop.

Henry Miller also had a pump and hose at work for the benefit of the Bridge Street House.

A purse circulated for the benefit of H. W. Jefferies found generous givers. He will then be able to rebuild in a short time.

Geo. M. Miller generously filled out W. S. Johnson with a new suit of clothing.

It is to be hoped that after the new engine house is finished, we will be able to get better service from the engine. Last Monday morning the water was frozen so as to render the machine useless for half an hour.

Two of a Kind.

Did you ever notice a catfish sunning his sweet sweet self on the shore of a creek? How he moves his way slowly along up the little inlets, along bits of driftwood, around chunks of clay, says Bob Burdette in the Brooklyn Eagle. He never worries, doesn't seem to care for much anything, isn't particularly anxious to keep in his shade, doesn't seem to care very much whether you see him or not, he just sauls along the shore, lolly, indolently, with never a splash or a ripple; he nibbles at some invisible substance once in a while and then abandons it, drifts on a little farther, finds a worm or a bug, swallows it with the air of a fish who has found what he has been searching for along five miles of coast, 100, and disappears into deep water.

Now, do you know the catfish devilows into a man? Here is a field for Mr. Darwin. Any warm, very warm, sunny day on the Ohio river, when the water is low enough to be yellow, you can see the man who is evolved from this catfish. He has a low skiff, usually square at each end; it isn't exactly a scow, it looks as though he intended to make it scarpenowed, but lacked energy enough to draw the sides quite together. It is the dirtiest skiff on the river. A hard rain or a sweeping freshet makes it dirtier. The rowlocks are bits of sapling sunk in holes. The man who owns that boat will hunt for days for a bit of growing timber too tight size rather than whittle down a piece of hickory. He rows along the still river with the motions and the instincts of a catfish. He never hurries. His oars drop into the water without a splash, and he softly raises them without a ripple. He moses his way along the bank. The spectacle of this man rowing down the middle of the stream, is as rare as sunshine at a picnic. Sometimes he wants to cross over to the other shore, but then he rows very rapidly in midstream, the only time he is ever known to make any exertion. Along the shoro is his favorite haunt, and here he and the catfish are alone, and he is drifter and lazier. He poddles aimlessly up to bits of driftwood, occasionally hauling some broken plank aboard his craft. He has a slight but tender eye for floating casks and kegs; like the other catfish he rejects four-fifths of the things he inspects, and what he accepts seems to give him very little pleasure. You never meet either of this pair in clear water or on cold days. But if the sun is hot, the water muddy, a sense of malaria pervades the soft air, swamps you may wander along the bank of the river and look for the catfish sunning along the shore. And when you have found him, fill up your eyes and lo, the man in the boat is not one hundred yards away. And you will wonder which of the twain evolved the other.

Gathering Grapes.

It is sometimes recommended that the grapes should be gathered as they ripen, by going over a vineyard two or three times and picking off not only bunches that are ripe, leaving the green ones, but even picking off separately three or four gripes from each bunch where it is not evenly ripened; and this is the practice that is followed to-day in making the great white wines of France and Germany; but it will certainly not be adopted in California while labor is as dear and wine as cheap as it is at present. Instead, that practice will be followed which is recommended by those writers who advise that the grapes of each variety be left on the vines till they are all fairly ripe, and then there be gathered clean at one picking. Where, however, different varieties are planted in the same vineyard, which ripen at different times, those only should be picked at the same time which ripen together.—California Wine Press.

Something skin to free love flourishes in Akron. Ordinarily wedlock is governed by the usual Chinese rules, but few of the couples living together are legally married. If a woman fancies a stranger she lives with him and does not love cease. When the relation becomes irksome they separate, and if children have been born more are sensibly divided. A child assumes the name of the parent who takes charge of it. In the village and country districts a peculiar form of bagnigie exists. The head of the family is bound to offer a male guest the choice of his unmarried daughters. This is any common politeness. In the mountain districts exists a sect who consider sex as symbolic of the divinity, and who perpetrate ossenities in their temples.

A TRUE STORY.

BY ABIE SINNE

"Where's the baby, grandmamma?"
The sweet young mother calls
Twice her work in Dorcas' Kitchen,
With its dainty whitewashed walls.
"Baby's asleep in the leaves he's knitting,
And looks so pretty all dressed,
But was a trace of his mamma
Can anywhere be found."

Nearmost of the merry prattle,
No guessing if it answer hale,
Comes the mother's anxious call:
"Is one of it in your garden?
All there talk the leaves and garden,
For sure it's the best
They may to each nook and corner,
I am anxious to be found."

And the mother's face grew pallid;
Some business ever gone thither?
"The Tiller's gone to the village,
Or to look for him,
And the baby's lost! "Is there flowers?"
Or to be that I found to think
Of he did so ill in the orchard
Where the cattle cost to drink.

"Where's Rover? I know he'd find him!
Rover!" In vain they call,
They hurry away to the orchard,
And there by the moss-grown wall,
Close to the well, lies Rover,
Half drop to fallen stone;
She was leaning over the well's edge
As a perfect fountain-stone!

She stretched her fingers down,
But Rover held her fast,
And never seemed to want the kicks
Of her little bare feet
Set sprightly on his breast
But wanded his tail instead,
To greet his frightened mourners,
While naughty little said:

"Rover's little girl is the letter;
Rover's little girl is mine,
Mamma, I want to baby her out,
And I like her house to be Dull Rover, he won't be one
And I don't love him
Are you naughty Rover?
Oh! why are you crying so?"

The matron kissed her, saying:
"My darling, darling child!
Dear Rover saved your life, my dear—
As I, see, he licks your hand!
Like Rover." Rover's tail
Was a promising moderately.
"Why, Rover, we must thank the friend
Who thinks so far our good."

MR. GILFIL'S MANEUVER.

BY M. G. ZARLEY.

It was a regular crush.

Not one of the "dear five hundred" had sent an excuse, but, to the last man and the last woman, had put in an appearance. And the result was something unprecedented, even to habitual party-goers.

Mr. Gilfil, Junior, just returned from a two years' absence "in Europe," immediately voted the whole thing a "dead bore," as he leisurely ascended the broad marble steps and made his way to the gentlemen's dressing-room.

A man in waiting hastened to his assistance.

"I am all right, am I not?" asked Mr. Gilfil, languidly.

"Right as a trivet, sir," said the valet, respectfully, his eye resting approvingly upon the tall and well-built figure, attired in irreproachable evening costume; "but if your books, sir, was lowered a trifle to the left——" He finished the sentence by hastily adjusting the spray of moss rosebuds in the required position.

Mr. Gilfil was watching the operation critically in the long mirror.

"Aw! yes, thank you," said he, carelessly running his white fingers through his perfumed locks. "That is decidedly better. Here's a coin for you, my man."

He slipped a silver piece into the valet's willing palm, and, taking one more survey of his appearance in the mirror, and evidently satisfied with the reflection that he saw there, turned himself slowly about, and languidly drifted down the staircase. Mr. Gilfil was very late—being, in fact, the last to enter the ballroom—and he was nothing detrimented in being late as a swell reception; indeed, no. Mr. Gilfil talked mingled in the best English society to no purpose during his long sojourn abroad, and he was much too well aware of his own importance in the fashionable world to be anything else than chary in the bestowal of his precious upon society, now that he had returned to his native land. His departure—and he had not been at home two hours ere he found some—declared behind his back, and under their breath, that Mr. Gilfil had come back to America so changed that in manners and appearance he was more English than the English were themselves.

And, to the casual observer, this seemed to be so; for there was the inevitable English whisker—the incomprehensible English contempt for the letter "r," and a predominance of hideous English plaid in the extensive wardrobe. And, as if to crown the whole, over the curious defection of speech, the objectionable whisker, and the hateful clothes, were thus all of them combined was the cold, supercilious, chilling English indifference of manner that now seemed to be one of the new characteristics of the returned traveler.

But Mr. Gilfil's traducers unjustly accused him. Down under the crust of his English clothes and his English manners, smoldered the unextinguishable love of home and native land, and, if occasion had required, Mr. Gilfil could and would have hurrahed for Uncle Sam and brave old "Yankee Doodle" as lustily as any of them.

Mr. Gilfil had been introduced to English society by Lord Randolph Churchill, and the said society had given him a cordial reception. But while he had helmobbed with counts and countesses, and lords and ladies, he had at heart remained faithful to Yankee traditions, and proved his faithfulness by falling in love with a fair countryman, whom he met while on a little tour in Belgium. An agre of a guardian had suddenly supervened upon the scene, however, and rudely nipped Mr. Gilfil's love affair in the bud, by disappearing with the young lady. The disappointed lover had made many futile efforts to trace them; but at last desisted, and, rather tired of everything—his British friends included—had turned his back upon them and come home.

The first thing that met him upon his return, was an invitation to the MacCabe reception, and, much against his will, he had dressed and found his way to the McCabe mansion. He loitered on the magnificent staircase, looking down at the surging tide of humanity, as it drifted beneath him, the gleaming pearls, the shimmering silks, the beautiful flowers, all combining to make a picture no artist could look upon cold and unmoved.

Mr. Gilfil gradually reached the bottom steps. As he did so, a tall, fair girl, in white silk and pearls, passed him by, leaning on the arm of a gray-haired veteran in a General's uniform.

Avis.

With difficulty Mr. Gilfil repressed the exclamation that was upon his lips; as it it was, he hurried after her.

Then it occurred to him suddenly that he had not yet paid his devoirs to his hostess, and he listened, as in a dream, to the voice of the footman announcing his name.

The MacCabes were very particular friends of his, and Mrs. McCabe, a pretty, fashionable woman of twenty-thirty, immediately took possession of him.

"Bad boy," said she, playfully tapping his shoulder with her fan. "Where have you been keeping yourself, and why are you so late?"

"I don't avoid," said young Gilfil, laughingly, taking hold of the pearl and gold tablets swinging at her wrist. "My dear Mrs. MacCabe, may I have a dawnce?"

"Two of them," returned his amiable hostess.

Mr. Gilfil immediately put himself down for a couple of waltzes and a redowa.

Mrs. MacCabe consulted her tablets as he dropped them. She looked pleased.

"Then you haven't forgotten," said she, laughing softly, as her quick eye took in the dances he had marked opposite his name.

"Naw," returned Mr. Gilfil, easily, "it is not possible to forget the fact that you are one of the most elegant dawncers in America. And my preference is for round dawnces, if you remember." His big blue-gray eyes were roving restlessly over the sea of faces about him, as if in search of some particular one, that he did not find.

"Fatterer."

At that instant the band broke into a burst of entrancing melody. Unconsciously Mrs. McCabe's foot beat time to the music.

"The Cornflower, is it not? and our waltz, if I am not mistaken," said Gilfil, claiming her hand.

Mrs. McCabe was an admirable dancer; ditto Mr. Gilfil; and they were soon the observed of all observers," as they went circling over the polished floor.

The tall, fair young girl in the pea-ls and white silk had, meanwhile, who was still leaning on the arm of the gray-haired gentleman in the general's uniform, stood watching the dancers from a shadowy alcove.

"Who's the gentleman with Mrs. MacCabe, Avis?" growled the veteran, in a deep undertone.

"I think he is a Mr. Gilfil, papa," said Avis, her fair face flushing slightly.

"Not that d——d English snob you met in Belgium?"

"I am told he is an American, papa."

"English or American, Avis, a snob's a snob, nothing more nor less," retorted the discomfited General, sagely. "And by the holy nose of Moses, he won't be allowed to come monkeying around you."

"No, papa," said Avis, faintly.

"I haven't the pleasure of his acquaintance, and am not dying to have it either. I've heard of him, and hearsay evidence is enough for me, and for you, too, Avis. Do you understand me?"

"Yes," Miss Avis had turned quite white, and unconsciously began pulling her bouquet to pieces.

"I'm dead against snobs. English snobs are bad enough, but American snobs are fifty per cent. worse, and they aren't even hanging about you my dear. You are my only daughter, and I'll have a snob-law by my notion, or I won't have any. No American Mr. Gilfils, with patent manners and patent English garments, can aspire to your hand, Avis."

"Why do you hate him so, papa? He saved my life, don't you remember?"

"Pah! I've heard the particulars of the whole affair, and for a well-trained Yankee girl I must say, Avis, that you disgraced your countrywomen. Any girl could have waded from that creek unaided. Saved—pah!"

"Mrs. McCabe evidently made a picture as she stood there looking like a tall, white lily against the dark velvet draperies behind her.

Mr. Gilfil's roving glance suddenly spied her.

"Would you mind telling me who the tall party is in the uniform there by that lovely girl?" asked he of his partner as they ceased circling about the room and leisurely approached the refreshment salon.

"Gen. Winfield; the lady is his only daughter. Shall I introduce you?"

"Saw," said Gilfil, laughing. "I fancy the pleasure would not be mutual; that is, not agreeable to the other gentleman. As to the lady, I met her in Belgium."

Mr. Gilfil looked expressively into his companion's eyes and tapped his left breast significantly.

"You are not serious," said Mrs. MacCabe, smothering a laugh.

"Never more so in my life," returned Mr. Gilfil quietly, "and we were getting on famously when that odious old general came swooping down upon us from some unknown corner of the earth and spirited Avis away."

"He is determined Avis shall marry a man who knows how to work. He took us for an Englishman, and he hates the English like poison. Poor young pend, Mr. Gilfil, that nobody but a long-headed son of Ind will be permitted to marry the General's daughter."

Mr. Gilfil's large, languid, blue gray eyes rested for a moment upon the companion's own.

"I would be willing to wager a good round sum, that I'll officiate yet as the General's son-in-law," said he, softly.

Gen. Winfield rose one morning, not long after, feeling very much out of sorts.

He was a plain man and lived in a quiet manner, shooting occasion and snobbery of any sort; but for some reason he had retained in his service for years a faithful old man, who served him by turns, and as occasion required, as valet, coachman, gardener, and companion as well.

But this paragon was gone.

Quite unexpectedly Tibbs had received a letter from a lawyer, setting forth the fact that a some legacy had been left to him, and forthwith Tibbs exercised himself from the General's service, and set up for a gentleman on his own account.

The General waxed wroth at this step on Tibbs' part.

"I don't see what ailed the ungrateful scamp," cried the irritable old veteran, "but I'll be even with him—I'll not advertise for a man."

He advertised in the Daily Times, and succeeded had he done so than he expected, if for it seemed as if every idle-headed man in the country was in search of that particular situation.

"Now, then," said the General to the score or so of men who appeared before him, "I want a sort of general purpose man, and I shan't hire any one who cannot drive my coach in good shape round the square.

Twenty voices verificated the proficiency of their owners as first-class whips.

"He must be a good driver, and a good reader, and possess a knowledge of the standard poets. I adore poetry, particularly Homer's. Stand out, now, all you who have read Homer."

Barely one responded.

"By the Lord Harry, only one," roared the General; "and perhaps you are shamming. I'll test your knowledge. Who was Penelope, tell me that?"

A tall, English-appearing young fellow, who was the one admitting a knowledge of Homer's works, answered:

"The wife of Ulysses."

"And Telemachus?"

"The child of the Trojan hero."

"Son on drive?"

"Like John."

"Good. Have you references?"

"In my pocket."

"By Jove! I guess you'll do. And that reminds me—who was Jove?"

"It has been insinuated that he was a heathen god."

"The rest of you may go," cried the General, waving his hand in dismissal to the disappointed crowd. "This is the man for me."

The General led the way to the breakfast-room. The mail had just been brought in, and Avis sat carelessly looking it over.

"Avis," cried the veteran, "this is my new man, and I believe he's a treasure. What is your name—I forgot to ask it before?"

"Tammus."

Avis started suddenly at the sound of the voice, and glanced at the new arrival, the color coming and going in her face.

"Thomas! Very well, Thomas, you may begin your duties by reading the letters to me this morning.

Thomas darted a quick and expressive glance at the General's daughter, and opened the correspondence.

It was a miscellaneous lot. There was a dun from the butter, likewise one from the butcher, and a long begging letter from the Chairman of a political committee; a couple of pithy communications from an old army chum of the Generals; and, last of all, a thick, square envelope, directed in a scrawling hand, and stamped with a coat-of-arms. The General listened to this communication in blank amazement.

"What in the d——ence do I hear? Read that again, Thomas!" roared he.

Thomas looked for a moment over the top of the sheet at the General's daughter, who had grown as red as a rose, and read again:

GEN. WINFIELD: Have I your permission to pay my addresses to your daughter? I am a nobleman's son, and a nobleman myself, and I feel that time has only made her more and more dear to me. My fortune is ample, and I can review you in my wilderness. Memo. Bank & Brain, who will answer any question you may like to ask concerning me. Yours, hoping for a speedy reply,

RAYMOND C. GILFIL, JR.

The General was black with passion.

"Thomas!"

"Yes, sir."

"Do you see the tongs yonder?"

"Plainly."

"Well, sir, pick that letter up with those tongs and put it on the coals in the grate there; at once, sir."

Thomas consigned the offending missive to the flames. "Old fool," he muttered, as the letter blazed up in his face, "a cantankerous old fool!"

"What's that?" roared the General.

"Cool, sir; the implacable of the thing, you know; very cool."

"Oh, very well! Now then, Thomas?" "I hear you."

"If this d——d Mr. Gilfil dares to present himself at my door I am not at home to him."

"No?"

"If he asks for Miss Avis, you are to tell him that Miss Avis is out; and, if you still pinetuate your statement by kicking him off the doorstepe, you'll not only place me under great personal obligations, but you will earn a 'tenner' at the same time."

Tibbs had been well enough in his day, and on compulsion had been known to read Homer, but Tibbs could not be compared with Tiresias. Besides in some things Tibbs was coarse. He had an elderly habit of dropping off to sleep at unexpected times, and it beastly snore that was certainly very trying to a person of the literary temperament. Thomas, on the contrary, was a gentleman with a gentleman's refined taste. Moreover, he was a scholar, and had Homer at his tongue's end, and he delighted in reciting wind-pages of the Odyssey to the enthusiastic old soldier, who, in listening to the burning story of the Hellenic wars, seemed to fight his own battles over again.

In the second week of Thomas' advent, the General was taken with an attack of malaria, and if the "new man" had seemed a treasure before, the veterans found him invaluable now. No sou could have tended a beloved father more tenderly than Thomas tended the wrinkled old soldier.

"Jy gad," ejaculated the patient, one day, as he found himself comfortably and sitting upronse more in his favorite chair by the fire, "Thomas, I don't understand how a man with your talents is contented to occupy an inferior position. By gad, sir, he ought to be ornament to the best society, if you could only realize it."

"I think, sir, I have mingled in the best society," returned Thomas, quietly.

"I believe you, by gad, I do, and as sure as my name is Winfield, you shall again."

"The best society is something of a bore at times."

"There's nothing timer; still it's a good thing for a man to have an entree in what the world is pleased to call aristocratic circles. I suppose you had your fortune and your friends fortune, you, as a natural consequence. But you'll find a friend in me, by gad; a friend in fine weather as well as fair. There is my hand on that. I always wanted a son, and never had one; but you shall be that son."

"Thank you. I appreciate your kindness. My fortune, however, is all my own, and it is not from poverty that I am in my present situation."

The General was in the act of spreading his handkerchief over his face, preparatory to taking a nap. He paused in the operation and stared musically at his man.

"Not poverty?" said he, in intense surprise. "Then what on earth was your reason, if I may ask?"

"Before I tell you my motive in assuming this position, I want to ask you of what you said a little while ago."

"Remind nothing," cried the General; "have no fear. I shan't go back on my promise, for I fancy that I know an honest man when I see him. My word is as good as my bond, as proceed."

"You were so bitterly opposed to me that, as I was fully determined upon it, I have been forced to resort to strategy in order to make your acquaintance."

"Stop!" roared the warrior, waving his handkerchief frantically. "Call Avis."

"I'm here, papa," said that young lady, coming out from behind a curtain.

"Thomas, you've cheated me," cried the General, with some heat. "Avis, who is this man?"

"My father!" faltered Avis, deprecatingly.

"Speak!"

"He is—is Mr. Gilfil."

"Pr-r-r-aised-y," grunted the General; "why in the deuce didn't I recognize him in the first place? I saw him at the McCabe reception."

He studied Thomas' face for a moment.

"I know the reason," he cried: "Mr. Gilfil, where is that abominable English whisker that you wore at that party?"

Mr. Gilfil rubbed his hand over his smoothly shaven face.

"That whisker is one of the sacrifices I made upon the shrine of success," said he, meekly.

The General looked askance from one to the other.

"You're a pair of 'em," said he, with withering sarcasm; "a pair of 'em, I mint say."

With that he shook out the folds of his red bandana, and, spreading it over his face, composed himself to sleep.

Mr. Gilfil sat down upon one side of the doughty warrior, and motioned to Avis to sit down upon the other, when they quietly waited for her father to awake. It was not long. The bandana suddenly dropped to the floor, disclosing a grinning, rubicund countenance.

"Thomas," cried the General, briskly.

"Yes, sir."

"If Mr. Gilfil should happen to call at any time, tell him I'm not at home. Gad! he is an, and will be happy to see him."

"I will, sir, and thank you."

"And if he should inquire for Miss Avis, you are to tell him that Miss Avis is in the parlor, and she will be delighted—mark that now—delighted to receive the gentleman."

"I am to undo-stand from this—" began Mr. Gilfil, with some agitation.

"That the best of success attends you," cried the General, briskly. "And you may go round and notify Mr. Gilfil's solicitors to confer with my lawyer at once; we will arrange the preliminaries for the marriage settlements without delay."

HUMOR.

WHEN a boy of 18 runs away with a girl of the same age the proceedings may be called a verdant elope.

IN this country the home rule is usually the home-wife, while at school it is the formula.—Carl Pretzel's Weekly.

BOXING-MATCHES are becoming more frequent, and the cry of the loves of pugilism is: "Dimpa yo hear the slug gin?"

THERE is not a single lawyer among the 1,000 convicts in the Virginia Penitentiary. Virginia lawyers seldom get found out.

INSTEAD of saluting your silver-haired friend as "aged old," why not address him as a "grayhound?"—Carl Pretzel's Weekly.

SAID a servant, presenting herself to a London housekeeper, "I'm a lagnee; if you please, m, but no objection to a Christian family!"

A LITTLE boy complained to his mother that the teacher couldn't remember his name. "When she speaks to me," he says, "she always calls me Silence."

A PHILADELPHIA clergyman says the latest joke he has heard is his wife's mother that the teacher couldn't remember his name. "When she speaks to me," he says, "she always calls me Silence."

A PHILADELPHIA clergyman says the latest joke he has heard is his wife's mother is afraid of malaria, and if the "new man" had seemed a treasure before, the veterans found him invaluable now. No son could have tended a beloved father more tenderly than Thomas tended the wrinkled old soldier.

"Jy gad," ejaculated the patient, one day, as he found himself comfortably and sitting upronse more in his favorite chair by the fire, "Thomas, I don't understand how a man with your talents is contented to occupy an inferior position. By gad, sir, he ought to be ornament to the best society, if you could only realize it."

"I think, sir, I have mingled in the best society," returned Thomas, quietly.

"I believe you, by gad, I do, and as sure as my name is Winfield, you shall again."

"The best society is something of a bore at times."

"There's nothing timer; still it's a good thing for a man to have an entree in what the world is pleased to call aristocratic circles. I suppose you had your fortune and your friends fortune, you, as a natural consequence. But you'll find a friend in me, by gad; a friend in fine weather as well as fair. There is my hand on that. I always wanted a son, and never had one; but you shall be that son."

"Thank you. I appreciate your kindness. My fortune, however, is all my own, and it is not from poverty that I am in my present situation."

The General was in the act of spreading his handkerchief over his face, preparatory to taking a nap. He paused in the operation and stared musically at his man.

"Not poverty?" said he, in intense surprise. "Then what on earth was your reason, if I may ask?"

"Before I tell you my motive in assuming this position, I want to ask you of what you said a little while ago."

"Remind nothing," cried the General; "have no fear. I shan't go back on my promise, for I fancy that I know an honest man when I see him. My word is as good as my bond, as proceed."

"You were so bitterly opposed to me that, as I was fully determined upon it, I have been forced to resort to strategy in order to make your acquaintance."

"Stop!" roared the warrior, waving his handkerchief frantically. "Call Avis."

"I'm here, papa," said that young lady, coming out from behind a curtain.

"Thomas, you've cheated me," cried the General, with some heat. "Avis, who is this man?"

"My father!" faltered Avis, deprecatingly.

"Speak!"

MESSRS. MASON & HAMLIN had late to leave they have made improvements in Upright Pianos as well as Cabinet Organs, having experimented for great years, and employed, and with the assistance of probably as able a corps of experts as can be found in any factory in the world, they have succeeded in producing a piano which for the highest and purest musical tones from the best judges. The distinguishing feature of merit is its adjustment to the action in the method of "stringing" the piano, which is patented by the firm, and is a very valuable improvement. Wonderful flexibility and quality of tone are claimed for it, and it has not its equal in the advantages resulting from a man with taste and attainments is contented to occupy an inferior position. How The Dram Shop Helps Business.

PROF. GEORGE E. FOSTER, M. P.

3. The dram shop cripples the productive power of every industry. Here a factory employing five hundred hands. The raw material comes in, the finished article goes out and supplies the wants of society. When does the factory do its best work? When the hands are industrious, steady and skilful. Whatever assists in these respects helps the factory.

A provision store is set up near by. Good, for now the men will get their food cheap, convenient, and of excellent quality, and thus be helped.

A clothier's establishment is provided. Good, for now the men get serviceable clothes with least expenditure of money and time, and so are helped.

A doctor opens an office. Good, for now the men can have advice and attendance, and thus be helped to get well and keep well.

A school house and church are built close by, and give guarantee that the moral and intellectual wants of the men will be looked after. The factory welcomes all these and does better work for their assistance.

Now the dram shop comes, eagerly desirous, of course, to help the factory. What results? Does it supply any raw material, any new machinery for the factory; any food, clothes, or comfort for the men—any stimulus to noble ambition and honest effort?

None whatever. The dram shop does not deal in such things. It simply opens its bar, displays its drinks, beckons, morning noon and night, to the passing workmen, and with siren voice invites them in. It grinds its music, flashes its lights, proffers its games, and allures the workmen from his home of rest or his place of labor. One after another drops in, tipples and drinks; the habit grows, the appetite forms, disorder increases, carousal becomes the order; loss of time, drunken debauch and crime follow. There is a loss in the industry, steadiness and skill of the workmen; the work is confused, lags in department after department, and in a little time the factory curses the dram shop as its worst enemy. So with every productive industry. Keep the dram shop away, and it does its best work; place the dram shop by its side and its best work is impossible.

The dram is the enemy of every productive industry; its whole influence tends to hinder, demoralize, confuse and defeat the best possible results of factory, foundry and farm.

4 The dram shop burdens business with heavy taxes. Business is always better, other things being equal, when it is most lightly taxed. Heavy taxes drive away business. Take your tax bill and scan its items:

Item 1. For schools—"A just fair tax," you say, and pay it willingly. As people grow more intelligent, prosperity increases, and property is safer.

Item 2. For fire department. Just think a moment. How many fires occur from drunken carelessness. A victim fresh from the dram shop staggers into a barn or out house and tries to light his pipe. A blaze starts, and before it is put out thousands of dollars lost, and so much expense to the department. Mark a goodly proportion of your fire tax to the credit of the dram shop.

Item 3. For poor. Ninety out of every one hundred paupers and occasional poor are so because of the dram shop. Mark ninety per cent. of your poor tax to that institution.

Item 4. For police. What constitutes the main work of the police in our towns and cities? Looking after the dram shops and their products. Vineland, with twelve thousand people, pays only one hundred dollars per year for police. Why? Vineland had no dram shop for the last twenty one years. Mark a large part of your tax for police to the dram shop.

Item 5. For criminal expenses. Whence comes our criminals? The experience of judges, sheriffs, a grand jurier, and the investigations of parliaments and legislatures, go to prove that seventy-five per cent of punishable criminals are graduates of the dram shop. Credit a large part of your tax for criminal expenses to that institution. Now, what have you? You have the fact staring you in the face that the dram shop helps business by laying open at least three quarters of all the taxes it pays. Should business submit to this gross burden, and that here and there a dram shop might get a lazy living?

But worse still! Every dram seller is an able-bodied pauper who lives or tries to live upon and business. If it can try. Suppose Jones puts up bar, stocks it behind it from January to December, takes in twelve thousand dollars, and gives out nothing but a barrel of brown paper. Who has kept the money? Smith sets up a bar; stands behind it from January to December; takes in two thousand dollars, and gives out nothing but whiskey. Who has kept Smith and his family? The farmers and business men of the country. He has produced nothing, and given nothing valuable in return for the two thousand dollars. He is an able bodied pauper.

What is difference between the two? Jones was considerate enough to take his living for no return, and harmed nobody. Smith was not contented with simply taking his living but harmed everybody he could. If he had given brown paper instead of whiskey, he would have been an innocent a man as Jones. Jones was a harmless pauper; Smith was a destructive pauper—that is all the difference.

Is it good for the business of the country that it has to support ten thousand able bodied men and their families, and, in addition, to bear the burden of taxation and ruin they impose?

"But," say the dram sellers, "you are not fair; do you not see that we must eat, wear clothes, have homes built, and so are continually buying and helping trade? Surely our custom is something, and there are ten thousand of us in Canada?"

Wouldn't you eat and wear clothes, and live in houses if you were not dram sellers? Surely, you don't mean to say that you would then go about naked, or become "Tanners," or live in the caves. And would not your custom be just as good in all these respects then as now? Now you impoverish whole families; do you eat enough to make up to the market what these families must do without? Now several go in rags, be sure you get their money. Do you wear several suits at a time so as to make up the loss to trade?

Now, men have to live in hovels, because you get their money for drink; do you live half a-dozen houses at once in order to make up the deficiency?

Go to! Close up your dram-shops, and yet you will eat and wear clothes and live in houses. The only difference will be that you will be honestly earning what you eat, wear and live in. You will be tilling the land, making good shoes, running good grain, manufacturing serviceable goods, and hurting nobody in the operation.

Better yet. You will be giving society something over and above your living, which helps it, enriches it, develops its manhood, and increases its virtues, instead of, as now, turning its sober citizens into idlers, paupers, and criminals.

Sergt. Bates, who carried the star-spangled banner through the Sonora, is sick, and nearly dead too, at his home in Rahway, N. J. A cent side not week, and his mother is sitting a date.

The Railroad Commissioners of Iowa have been at last assured to action concerning the oppression of the farmers by the railroads whose exorbitant charges for freight transportation are causing such widespread distress, and are moving toward an investigation of the abuse.

John B. Hoffman was executed at Cincinnati, for killing his son three years ago. Two men supported him while the handcuffs and noose were being adjusted, and he kept time a child at the reading of the death warrant.

Judge Woods, of Indianapolis, positively refused to spend upon the records of bincourt the sum-total of James G. Blaine that a fair trial of his libel suit against the Sentinel could not be had in Indiana. The copy was therefore, made that the case was voluntarily dismissed.

Hogshoelers in Nebraska has caused a loss of probably $200,000, the loss in Sarpy County alone amounting to $50,000.

From March 24, 1855, to April 20, 1885, the Illinois Central has issued has paid to the State of Illinois the sum of $1,618,0.11.

The Rev. H. D. Jardine, an Episcopalian pastor at Kansas City, has sued a savings of that town for $10,000 for slander.

SOUTHERN.

Gen. B. M. Prentiss, who recently visited the battle field of Shiloh, says that the bones of the unknown Confederate dead be removed to the National Cemetery and their be re-inter place to property buried.

Indictments for wilful murder have been returned by the Grand Jury at New Orleans against Recorder Thomas J. Ford, his brother, Patrick Ford, Constabulary E. E. Cardwell, Charles Baker, and W. H. Buckley, Policemen John Murphy, and Baptiste J. Pavoine. Recorder Ford and a gang of followers, including those named, set upon Capt. J. H. Bursky in the street Dec. 1 and killed him.

P. J. Slocum, school teacher at Horse Cove, Ky., refused to leave town, though threatened by anonymous writers. The other night a mob called at Slocum's house. The timber opened fire and the invaders fled, leaving one of their number dead and another badly wounded, several of their horses being also seriously injured.

In the presence of the Cabinet, diplomatic corps, and prominent persons at the White House, on Tue., ie President Arthur touched the electric button which set the machinery at the New Orleans Exposition revolving. It be sub-balance at New Orleans was heard and the audience outside to the occasion were made, the signal of President Arthur, opens the show, being telegraphed from the White House, sent read on the assemblance in the Exposition Building.

A desperate fight between the local authorities of Dunegan Settlement, Ga., and a gang of moonshiners resulted in the death of two of the moonshiners.

Five persons were burned to death in a fire at Newport, Ark.

WASHINGTON.

A bill has been prepared by the National Commerce of Health Boards, in session at Washington, embodying the views of the conference as to the best method of preventing the introduction of cholera into this country.

The Comptroller has authorized the Mechanic Bank, of Cleveland, to begin business with a capital of $1,000,000.

A dispatch to the Secretary of the Navy from Nagasaki states that a typhoon has broken out in Corea.

For the first time since his appointment, Chief Justice Waite is unable to transact business.

Premiums of support have been secured by the National Sanitary Conference recently in session at Washington which encourage the belief that Congress will pass the sanitary bill agreed upon by the conference.

Col. James G. Berret, of Washington, has been appointed by the Democratic National Committee Chairman of the committee that will make all arrangements for the inauguration ceremonies on the 4th of March.

The Congressional Commission to arrange for the dedication of the Washington Monument invited all civil, military, and naval organizations in the United States to offer to Mr. Blaine's house, and who is not well informed as any of the late candidate's friends regarding his views and future intentions, is credited by a Washington correspondent with saying:

Mr. Blaine does not intend to withdraw from political life nor will up the field in his own the Chicago convention. For a few months he will be only his feature the most of his time at his home in Augusta, Maine. He will return to Washington about the 1st of December of the regular session of Congress and will remain there until adjournment. After his literary labors are completed he will go to Europe and will not return to the United States for a year or two, or as long as he can do so without.

Gen. Hancock's friends are sanguine that he will be nominated by the Democrats for President, and that he will be elected. Hancock is a soldier, and will probably, this they feel sure, be a popular candidate. The Republicans have a soldier, too, and it is a question which of the two will be the more popular with the people. Whether he will again enter upon the duties of the office of President, he will not decide until after the 4th of March, and in the meantime he will be in the grave hands. The politicians are not so sure of his intentions as they were before the election, and many of them are believed that the republican convention in June will call him to lead the party again, and that he will accept the call. The Democrats are confident that the election will be decided against that the Blaine ticket will lack at least a few electoral votes of being a majority, and that the Republican party will not be in office that day. Mr. Blaine's friends say, on the contrary, that he looked him to be the candidate of the party, and that he will be, if he has any hope expressed to his own friends, men who have been trusted leaders in the party, and whose cordial support he has a right to expect during the late campaign, are not to be left out in the cold, and that he will not be a candidate for anything, and he does not feel that the party has any claim upon him for more than a passive support. In other words, it is understood he has made to be an absolutely free agent, and that he does not intend to be a candidate for anything during the next four years, whether the Democrats or Republicans are in power, and that he will not be a candidate for President in 1888. His friends claim that he has never had a fair trial, or that he has never enjoyed the support of the party in the matter of a political nature, and that he is now in a position to do so, and that he will do so. He is not a candidate for the Senate, and will not be a candidate for Congress in any district. He will not be a candidate for Governor of Maine, and will not have a political job of any kind. He will not be a candidate for the Senate. With these statements, and with the knowledge that he is in the last year he can be in the presidential chair, and conscious of a full, the speed one page, he will be satisfied

THE JOURNAL.

TO OUR READERS.

Without printed address labels it is not possible for every subscriber to know just when his subscription expires, but there are some who know themselves to be in arrears, and to these we appeal. To those who have paid in advance, or with whom we have special terms, this does not apply. Presents will not outlast the year with. Paper, material, and help must be paid for. We take from as easy as possible with all—some from we could for our own good. Now we must have some CASH. Don't all pay up at once, as a few have done because we asked for it, but, and don't wait because you can't pay the whole amount at one time, but pay all the as you get it, and help us keep things moving. Begin at once, we need the CASH NOW.

Centenary sermon at the M. E. church Sunday morning, Dec. 28th. Sunday school centenary concert at 6.30 Sunday evening.

Thermometer touched 10° below zero at Boyne Falls Friday morning. At Petoskey it was 2° below, and at Charlevoix it was at zero.

Round Lake was covered with ice Monday morning, but not thick enough to prevent the passage of Greening & Gricken's fish tug.

Attention is called to the new advertisement of the Detroit Weekly Free Press in another column. Remember we club with the JOURNAL for $2 a year.

On account of the severe storm last Monday evening, the meeting of the Liberal Club at the opera house was postponed to next Monday evening, Dec. 29th.

We acknowledge receipt of an invitation to the second annual reception of the Grand River Boat Club, at the Lansing House, Lansing, Tuesday evening, Dec. 30th.

The Grand Rapids Tradesman says that D. C. Loveday & Co., hardware dealers at East Jordan, have added a line of groceries, purchasing their stock of Shields, Bulkley & Lemon.

At the residence of C. R. Bellinger, last evening there was a nicely arranged private Christmas tree, gotten up for his family and a few friends, which pleased the little folks present.

A package of dance programs mailed at this postoffice last Tuesday addressed to N. N. Card, Norwood, has not yet been received and no one seems able to tell what has become of it.

A burning chimney during the terrible wind storm last Monday gave A. D. Cruickshank a big scare, and came altogether too near burning the house. The vim with which he made an open ing to the attic would surprise some housekeepers.

W. A. Norton and family, of Charlevoix, are visiting relatives and friends in this village. That county evidently agrees with "Will," and from all reports he agrees with the country and the people pretty well.—Grand Ledge Independent.

Miss Bertha Ray, of Lansing, aged nine years, writes a letter, enclosing a sheet of paper on which is a list of 128 words, composed from the letters in the word "Charlevoix," using no letter twice and not including proper names. Can any boy or girl in Charlevoix do better?

Rev. C. F. Vandekoe has been invited to another department of church work, which it seems would be to his advantage in various ways. At present the matter is not fully decided, but the probabilities are that the church here cannot spare his services yet a while.

At the town hall, Norwood, last evening, occured a very pleasant ball given by the Norwood dancing class. Thirty-three numbers were sold, and the dance continued till morning. Close parties will probably be held during the winter, and the success of this one will make them all popular.

Farmers would find it easier to file over hard times if they would deposit less on one line of industry. There are numerous little industries which go naturally hand in hand with farming, and which help out amazingly in hard times. The success and profit of the celery culture, which is gaining ground so fast in this section, is well known. The extensive cultivation of horse radish was begun last year at Coldwater, the sum raising 41,000 pounds on a piece of ground 14x15 rods, and finding demand for more than he had. Cucumbers for pickles also find a ready market, and might be raised by many farmers with profit. —Allegan Gazette.

Geo. W. Wrisley has a case of scarlet fever in his family, and it is probable his family of five will be similarly afflicted before it is ended. There is also a case in the family of Mr. Dygert, and another in the family of Mr. Wm. Cross. Our people cannot be too careful in preventing the spread of this disease.

Attention is called to the card of Dave Bradbeer, photographer, in another column. His rooms over Upright, Emrey & Co's are fast approaching completion, when he will have what has long been needed in Charlevoix. The quality of his work will place his studio at once in the front rank in northern Michigan.

The following handed us by a reader of the JOURNAL, is said to be an excellent disinfectant for use in cases of contagious diseases, such as scarlet fever and diphtheria, which are now somewhat prevalent: "The compound of iodoform and chlorine with alumnia, known as bromo chlorium, has all the requisites of a good disinfectant and deodorizer. It is without odor, is not poisonous, or corrosive. Clothes wring out in bromo chlorium, diluted one part to fifteen of water, and suspended around the room, will speedily and completely remove the most pungent and offensive odors, also parasitic formations.

BAY SPRINGS.

Snow is 2½ feet deep in the woods.

The bay and this end of Pine lake is frozen over from shore to shore.

Our people have all found employment, who were able and wanted to work.

Bay Springers are jubilant over our postoffice. We have a daily mail, for which we are indebted to H. B. Chapman, and thank him most heartily.

The House factory and mill is the only mill doing anything here now.

H. B. Chapman's health is so poor that he is seldom able to get out or do business this winter. His presence on our streets is greatly missed. He was always out early in the morning looking after his work, and displaying more activity and energy than most younger men.

Our school is closed for holiday vacation, which teachers and scholars are heartily enjoying.

Mrs. Lucy Belisa is in very poor and failing health this winter.

A. T. Boise narrowly escaped serious injury one day last week. He was drawing wood, and the sleigh tipped over and threw him against another log. His legs were caught between the two logs, but instead of being crushed as they would have been had he set two feet farther back on the log, they were only bared so that he limped in walking.

Ironton.

Preaching Sunday morning and evening by Rev. Mr. Wood of the Congregational church.

Christmas tree at the new church Wednesday evening.

Teams are crossing the arm on the ice at Ironton.

Miss Cherrie, who has been absent for two months, has returned and taken her place in the postoffice.

The Pine Lake Iron Co. have added a pair of horses and a pair of mules to its force of teams.

H. M. Cherrie is in town again. A. Box has returned from Chicago.

An ox belonging to Mr. Baldwin broke through the ice on the arm Monday morning, but was rescued.

The health of Ironton is good,—so sickness is town.

Business is Looking Up.

A few weeks since the celebrated Schuylerville paper mills manufactured forty five tons of cardboard to be used exclusively in making playing cards. Other large orders for the same material are waiting to be filled. These demands for a peculiar quality of paper show pretty clearly what our national game really is and afford a text for the moralist to elaborate. Draw poker and old sledge have still a strong hold on the popular heart.—Philadelphia Ledger.

MERRY CHRISTMAS.

Services at the Churches, Opera House, and Elsewhere.

Christmas eve was duly observed at both churches with appropriate musical exercises, presents, etc.; at the opera house with a masquerade dance; and at numerous private houses with trees, parties, etc.

At the Congregational church, the spaces on the walls were filled with mottoes, emblems, etc., appropriate for the day and the services, while numerous festoons of evergreen hung between the most suitable projections. The exercises were a service of song, responsive readings, remarks by the pastor and others, and a distribution of oranges, apples, pop-corn, candy, etc., to the Sunday school, by Santa Claus, who had his "headquarters" built at one side of the pulpit. Going down the chimney, he opened to the delighted and astonished eyes of the little folks a whole store of good things. The ladies and gentlemen who have had charges of the work certainly have reason to feel proud of their success.

At the M. E. church a magnificent display of ornamentation in evergreen and gold was made, representing many hours of hard work. The exercises were a service of song by the choir, remarks by the pastor and others, a recitation by Nellie Green ing, and the distribution of presents to the members of the Sunday school from a full-rigged ship in front of the pulpit.

At the opera house, a masquerade dance, under the auspices of the knights of labor, occupied the attention of a large number of our people until a late hour.

There were numerous private parties, which we have not time to mention in detail.

Pennsylvania on Her Knees.

Pennsylvania, the lad house of high tariffism is reaping the reward of its own excess. Tin iron manufacturers of that state are astounded to see southern iron sold at their very doors. Recently a steamer unloaded on her wharf in Philadelphia 210 tons of Alabama pig iron, which had been shipped from a place of manufacture to Savannah by rail, and thence by water. The freight from the furnace to Philadelphia was $4.64 a ton, and the iron was sold at about $16.50, thus leaving only $12 to the makers. Even at this figure the manufacturers say they have a profit of $2 per ton. Pennsylvania pig iron is quoted at $17.50 in Philadelphia, and the manufacturers aver they cannot make a profit at those prices. Jan. 1, 1882, Pennsylvania pig was selling at $26, and for years the Pennsylvanians have declared that iron cannot be made in this country for less than $28 to $30 a ton. Previous to 1882, when Pennsylvania had nearly a monopoly of the manufacture, prices were still higher, though coal, ores and labor were valued about the same as at present. Stimulated by these large profits, with the tariff which they helped manipulate keeping out foreign iron, the greedy manufacturers flooded the country with their output, doubling the total production in five years. Pennsylvania made 2,628,000 tons in 1883, against 1,342,000 tons in 1878. Though they succeeded in keeping up the barriers against foreign competition, they could not crush the rising industry in Alabama. At Washington last winter the southern manufacturers told congress they wanted no more tariff on iron; on the contrary, they preferred free raw materials. They said they could make iron at $12 a ton, protection or no protection, and they did not fear English competition. Pennsylvania scoffed at this, and her representatives, without exception, planted themselves in the way of tariff reform.

But the southern manufacturers increase their output from 777,000 tons in 1877 to 559,000 tons in 1883, and in 1883 send ship loads of their iron to the very doors of Pennsylvania furnaces, many of which are a-cold. Pennsylvania starts with alarm, but realizes that the old cry of "free trade ruin" and "more tariff" will not avail her now. It is not English, but American iron that is crowding her out. The wonderful tariff, so valiantly and persistently defended, such a bonanza of wealth when Pennsylvania had a nation's iron trade in her relentless grasp, is now useless. The golden egg has been ruthlessly broken.

Now lo and behold, Pennsylvania wants free trade! The horse has turned about to go the other way, and it is a different color he presents. It is free raw material that the Pennsylvanians want at last—Cuban, African, and Spanish ores on the free list. Their only salvation appears to be cheaper ores to mix with their own. Without them they cannot hold their market away from the southern competitors.

Now that Pennsylvania has long brought to her knees her prayer should be granted, selfish though it be. Iron ores and most other raw materials should be placed on the free list. The whole tariff schedule should be revised upon a plan that recognizes the existence and desires of Alabama as well as Pennsylvania, Nebraska as well as Connecticut, a great west, south and east, and not the latter alone.

When Pennsylvania asks for revenue reform nothing remains but to go ahead and make it.—Chicago Herald.

POLITICAL NOTES.

Gov. Begole is disgusted with the closing weeks of his term of office by too free exercise of the pardon power.

The republican party came into power with a war between states; it will go out of power in a war with the leading nations of the world—at least it seems to be the determination of President Arthur to bring out such complications if possible.

The work of the life-saving crews of Lake Michigan has been remarkably successful during the season of navigation for 1884. We give only a portion of the record. Number of stations 17, number of disasters 54, numbered persons saved 178, lost none. Lake Michigan must certainly have a well organized and well conducted life-saving service to establish such a record. —Elk Rapids Progress.

The Spanish treaty will hardly be ratified by the senate as one of its provisions removes the duty on sugar. The tariff on sugar is the best tariff some of any the people have to pay besides it yields $20,000,000 annually, nineteenths of which goes directly into the treasury and is virtually a tariff for revenue, with incidental protection which we recognize as an old fashioned democratic doctrine.—Rapids Progress.

The furnace banking project has been dropped—out of discussion, even—and now we hear that a number of plants heretofore idle are thinking seriously of going into blast about the beginning of the new year. Thousands are inclined to this by the well known fact that for years past no cry about kept pace with consumption for the past several months, and that any material increase in consumption would be at once followed by a brisk demand, the stock on hand being very light.—Mining Journal.

The effect of Cleveland's election on Justice Cowles' bees has been wonderful. There was a while, when the result of the election was in doubt, that his bees suspended operations, not knowing but that free rum would not be after pay for the wear and tear of production. But lately they have settled down to business, and a specimen of their egg sham is in Mr. Cowles on Monday weighs four ounces and measures 9 by 7½ inches. Have those bees gone crazy over the result of the election?—Eaton Rapids Journal.

Will some well-informed person please tell us which is the free trade party of the United States? There is a stronger flavor of free trade in President Arthur's message than there was in the democratic platform, which the protectionists of the country found so distasteful. And one of the recommendations embodied in the report of Secretary McCulloch, of the treasury department, is "that the existing duties upon raw materials which are to be used in manufacture should be removed. This can be done to the interest of our foreign trade." In which the secretary plants himself squarely on the platform of Mr. Hewitt, and far in advance of the majority of democratic reformers. Perhaps the issue troubles that we read so much about may be properly changed to the presence of a revenue reform president at the head of the government.

Imitation Pearls.

"You would hardly think," said a dealer in fancy goods, holding up a string of glass beads as big as a cherry and as transparent as pearls, "that to get the pearl tint on each one of those little glasses the lives of at least fifteen beautiful fish had to be sacrificed, would you? But they do, though, and although they are made in Venice, and that sitting represents a catch of nearly five hundred fish, and the extinction of a good many cubic inches of glass-blower's breath, I can sell it to you for a quarter and make a fair profit.

"They've been turning out beads like these in Venice ever since 1656. There is a fish in the Adriatic they call the Bleak fish, but why name it I can't say. There is nothing bleak about its appearance. It is a graceful fish, with a glittering array of silver scales. They are more prolific and swarm in larger schools than the herring. Our ancestors in 1656 a resident of Venice, Signor J. Jequin by name, placed several of these fish in a small aquarium to observe their habits. After they had been confined in the aquarium for some time, he noticed that the water took on a pearly hue. Believing that this was communicated by the scales of the bleak fish, Jequin tried some experiments with them. He found that water could be so cleverly charged with the tint from these scales that goes on being dipped in it and then allowed to dry had every appearance of a pearl. He coated glass beads with the liquid, and they were readily taken for large pearls. The coating would not resist moses friction, however, and soon rubbed off the surface. Finding that a great scale could be had for beads made in imitation of pearls if the coating could be made permanent, Jequin conceived the idea of having the glasses blown hollow and then filling the fugitive liquid to the inner surface. This was a success from its start, and the glass pearl bead business got its first boom. It requires the scales of four thousand bleak fish to make half a pint of the pearl liquid. They are simply removed from the fish, which are as much as nonsensicals, and soaked in tepid water. Something is very small quantity of ammonia and ammonia is added to the liquid. It is introduced inside the bead in a small tube, and when it is dry, a coating of wax is run over it. Fortunately for the fish, the trade in these beads, pretty and cheap as they are, is not alarmingly large."—New York Sun.

Snake Fiction.

Rasens, who has charge of the reptile specimens in the Smithsonian Institute, counsels most of the popular belief as to snakes. Some of the most crooded have no existence. The hoop snake, which takes the end of its tail in its mouth and rolls over and over, killing everything that it touches with its venom, and the blow snake, the breath of which is deadly, are fictions. As serpents move about they are constantly feeling ahead with the tongue, and the forward throat and the peculiar forked appearance of this organ has given rise to the false idea that with this the stinging is done. It is generally thought that there are a great number of poisonous snakes in North America there are but three species—the rattlesnake, the copperhead or moccasin, and the coral. There are about thirty varieties of these species altogether. The copperhead is probably the most dangerous, as it is vicious and never gives warning of any kind before striking. The rattlesnake, though more poisonous than either of the others, will rattle at the approach of anything, and try to get away unless brought to bay. The coral is smaller and is a native of the southern states. The bite is not necessarily fatal, if the proper remedies are used in time, as, on account of its size, the amount of poison is small. When a reptile strikes he throws his whole body forward, and the fangs penetrate the object against which they come. The hinder part of the body remains in position, and none of our snakes are in a habit of reaching more than half their length.

The Lover's Fatal Blunder.

"Louise," said he, as they, despising a plurality of chairs, and practicing an economy of gas, sat in the parlor together, a few evenings before the riding of the honeymoon—"I ought to tell you that I belong to a Masonic lodge, and have to attend its sessions, so absent, when we are married you mustn't feel if some evenings I have to be away from my little wifey-ifey." And she designing villain chuckled at his prudence.

"Of course I won't, William," she said softly; "how many lodges do you belong to?"

"Only one, darling," he answered.

"And when does it meet? How often? On what evening?"

"O, once a week—on—on Thursdays."

"Very well; then I shall have you at home every other evening in the week—that will be so nice."

And as she took out her tiny note book and made a memorandum on the subject, he felt that, after all, he had made a mistake.—New York Mail.

How to Get a Public Office.

There are one hundred and twenty-nine offices within the gift of the new administration, and now is the time for those seeking public employment to take proper steps to secure one of these lucrative positions. To this end the United States Blue Book will prove an indispensable guide and assistant. The Blue Book is a register of all Federal offices and employments in each State and Territory, the District of Columbia, and abroad, with their salaries, emoluments, and duties; shows who is eligible for appointment, the civil service rules, questions asked at examinations, how to make an application and how to pass the ordeal; contains a small amount of important and valuable information, relative to government, and has never before published. Send seventy-five cents to J. H. Seidle, Publisher, Washington, D. C., and secure a copy of the Blue Book. Agents wanted.

To Consumptives.

The advertiser having had placed to his hands the formula of a simple vegetable remedy for the speedy and permanent cure of Consumption, Catarrh, Bronchitis, Asthma, and Throat and Lung affections, after having thoroughly tested its wonderful curative powers in hundreds of cases, feels it his duty to make it known to those who may need it. The recipe will be sent free of charge to all who request it, with full directions for preparing and using. Address Prof. W. H. Ainsworth, 79 Pine St., Philadelphia, Pa.

"I'm might well win long the choice, Captain?"
"Do I look as if I had lost it?"
"Ah, I see you don't look like a loser."
"And you long the one." He cried, "Nay, nay! I think rather big the Cape of May."

"Oh, my!" exclaimed, with a tone of her cheek, "Cape May! Why, I'm so glad!"
"Glad that Gilbert's lower entry-bank kiss to-night."
"How wicked and there the cents!"
"Not so wicked, with a fogey at her chaney."
"Oh, not quite! I will like for the Cape May?"
"Bad, I thought that you loved the wide, round
Like a 14, with brilliant hope.
"Why, Gilbert, I'm sure you off to me.
"To me, I not put on phrase.
"Not I love thee and I love you, I can?"
"Not for donnie to be to my partners."
"Dancing your Cape of May?" answered.
"I will make a worse beat."
"Not even your mind with us not mass;
Her words while wounded pride.
"Ah, you mistake." he cried. "Nay, nay!
"Or not the Cape, but you, my May."

GID'S ADVENTURE.

BY LILY M. CURRY.

Gideon Foster had been three weeks a resident of the metropolis, and was shortly to "go into business," under the supervision of his uncle, Mr. Archibald Fuller, of the prosperous firm of Smith & Fuller. Gideon—or Gid, in the language of his intimates—was a healthy young Southerner who, during the past year or so, had penetrated Western fastnesses, in delightful mine and ranches, attained his majority, and succeeded in conversing his sturdy old Tennessee father, a well-off farmer of advanced age, that the city was the correct place for young men of pluck and talent. Gid was tall and strong; had small, keen eyes, a leaky mouth and a long upper lip. His complexion was an artistic mixture of tan and sunburn. He had at times a nervous twitching of the long upper lip, accompanied by a slight sniff. He had an excellent opinion of himself, and was given to telling "what he think down our way." Few his age he was well informed on general topics.

Gid's uncle, a handsome, portly bachelor, yet in his thirties, had thus far kept a kindly eye upon his relative, feeling mentally responsible for the young man's safety and well-being in the great and alluring city. But Gid was beginning to chafe under the friendly espionage, and mentally resolved to break from all accustomed ties. Particularly vexed was he one afternoon when, but this is the way it happened: Gid, being idle and unencumbered, was standing in the street before his hotel, when a couple of handsome, well-dressed ladies chanced to pass. One of the ladies glancing up, caught his eye, blushed, and fluttered a little. Gid was alive in an instant; quite ready for a sly flirtation. At home, as in any small village, no harm was thought of such things, the lest young ladies being given, at times, to little adventures of the sort. He never stopped to consider that city customs might be different, but started in pursuit of the blushing and mischievous damsel, raising his hat in an impulsive moment and meeting an unmistakable welcome. He thought them very pretty; their complexions were marvelously fine. The trio proceeded slowly down the promenade, laughing and chatting as they went. Gid was quite in his element—he was devoted to pretty girls—and anticipated an invitation to call, when, he felt sure, his credentials and his own candor would win over the "old folks."

They had proceeded in this fashion for some distance, when Gid looking up, perceived his uncle approaching. As the latter came close, his countenance appeared to grow suddenly stern with horror. Reality, Gid had never before seen him look so, and wondered what could have happened. Mr. Fuller came quickly on, and, as he stood abreast the trio, scarcely paused. "Gid!" he said, in a terrible tone, and motioned with his head toward the hotel, then passed on.

"Well?" he said.

"Well!" fairly thundered the elder gentleman, pushing him into a corner of the hall. "What under heaven do you mean by such conduct?"

"Conduct? What have I done?"

"Do you mean to tell me you didn't know the character of those women?"

"Character? Why, they are very nice girls.

Mr. Fuller regarded him in silence, then spoke compassionately:

"Well, you are simpler than I thought, and for all your Western travel: How did you meet them?"

Gid hesitated.

"Why—why, I met them —"

"You flirted with them! Now, that might do in a village, but city folks don't make acquaintances that way. And, if you're going to stay in the city, you don't want to label yourself 'Sucker.' With care? do you?"

With the well-meant severity M. Fuller turned away.

Gid was deeply mortified, and hardly knew what to do with himself. His mortification lasted all the evening, making him seem so low-spirited that Maclean, a young Southern friend, chaffed him sadly, and asked if he were lovesick.

"I'll take you to see a pretty girl to-morrow," Maclean said, meaningly, "at her studio; she is an artist."

Gid roused a little, asking:

"What's her name?"

"Daisy Darrow; Miss Margaret Darrow, more correctly."

"A fact?"

"Yes, a fact."

"Is she really pretty?"

"I think you'll say so. She paints well; doesn't need to, either, for she is an only child, and her father is well off. He's in Europe now; she lives with her aunt, mother, I mean. Maclean was really very glib with the young lady's pedigree, considering how slightly he knew her. "She's just back from the country, and she'll be off to the seashore before long; so we must surely go to-morrow."

"Suits me to a T," and Gid, forgetting his woe.

A little after eleven the next day, Miss Darrow sat in an easy chair before an easel, on the third floor of a building given up to studios and the like. Miss Darrow had just arrived in company with her been companion, Miss Mabel Hallett, a feminine faithful of Cathay, a dazzling blonde, as devoted to her pen as Daisy to her brush. Miss Hallett shared the studio with her friend, leaving a very literary-looking, paper-littered table in one corner. The studio was charming, as are usually such places. Miss Darrow was dark-eyed and dark-haired, with a rather pale face and very pretty, crimson lips. She wore a neat-fitting dress of old-gold lawn and curry lace; a black hat with an old-gold scarf, and boots with old-gold tops. She was in truth a golden harmony. Miss Hallett wore white myrtle green richness, and sat very proud on the sofa, while Daisy lounged lazily in the easy-chair.

"Well, Peaches, my darling?" asked Miss Hallett. She always called Daisy "Peaches" in some unfathomable fondness for the tall, pale, deliberate-voiced artist, with her patrician beauty.

Miss Darrow replied disconsolately:

"My love, I am in despair. I am out of the mood for painting. I feel a desperate longing to do a portrait. Couldn't you get me a new model?"

"Of what style, pray?"

"O, a strong face; an old face—homely, rugged, uncouth! Anything! Only I want novelty."

Miss Hallett shook her head.

"I don't know where to look for it, unless down in Mulberry street; and I'm in dreadful fear of the cholera."

Daisy yawned.

"Some one is coming up stairs," she said, without troubling to move. "To see us, I suppose; there's nobody else knows my studio."

A moment later Maclean's well-meaning, short-nosed visage intruded itself through the door.

"Good-morning, ladies; may I bring a friend?"

Miss Hallett arose with vivacity.

"You are quite welcome; we are trying not to be dull."

Daisy had put out her hand, languidly.

"Are you having your vacation?" she asked. Then, as the ladies glancing up, caught his eye, suddenly reddened, and became cordial.

Gid looked admiringly about the room.

"It's very warm to-day," he said, presently.

"It is, indeed; we have some lemonade" —and Miss Hallett proceeded to produce some refreshments in the glasses.

"I dare say; he'll probably call again soon."

Nor was Daisy greatly surprised when they received, some two hours later, by messenger, an invitation to join the young gentleman that same day for a ramble in the park.

"The assurance!" exclaimed Miss Hallett. "We—and they! Ramble in the park, indeed! Saub them, gorgeously, dear?"

"Saub them!" repeated Daisy. "You forget, dear; I can't saub any model. On the contrary, we must accept."

And immediately she dispatched word to that effect by the messenger, asking Maclean and his friend to call for them in a hack.

At the appointed hour Maclean arrived, alone.

"It's all right," he explained. "Gid was detained; he'll meet us at the place—I mistrust station."

They reached the station ahead of time, and sat down on a platform bench.

Just then Miss Hallett discovered she was parching with thirst, and Maclean moved upon an opposite adjournment to a neighboring drug-store, for soda-water.

"Are two any gay," said Daisy dotterpitately, "and I will wait here. Mr. Foster may arrive at any moment, and I am not at all thirsty."

She fell into a reverie as they hurried off, from which she was presently aroused by the excited voice of the station doorkeeper: "Local omnibus!"

"That's to way to come up! You want to come up the other door, and pick your tickets."

"O, I'll lose my ticket," cried an impatient, rather nasal voice, and Daisy, looking up, saw Gid Foster, crimson-faced with hurrying through the heat. "Shoe, afterward, in dee riding hit appearance to Miss Hallett, declared, "Do you know, he came up the west stairs, and really, I believe he must have vaulted the gate, for no train was passing, and of course the gate was shut. Yes, he must have scrambled over that high fence; he looked as red as a turkey, too!"

"Ah," said she, with half a smile "You have come! Well, perhaps you'd like to see your ticket and deposit it. The others will believe directly, and wean meet me next train."

It was not had at all, at the park. They loafed awhile, viewed the menagerie, consumed the small, and brought up at the restaurant. It happening to be a concert afternoon, the restaurant was very much crowded. The ladies wanted at the door with Maclean, and Gid went ahead to find seats. The lad no hesitation in asking a strange gentleman to relinquish his table in favor of the "ladies in our party." The stranger looked inquired and inquired, "Where m—(naughty word) do you want me to go? Out in the dark?"

Other seats were vacant at that moment, and Daisy and Mame came up smiling; they had simply taken the stranger's remark. The latter looked crestfallen. Daisy's beauty was "It's just as well," said Daisy, blandly, "because I have a confession to make, Mr. Foster." She lowered her eyelids, and displayed beautiful eyelashes. "I hope you will pardon me, also begun.

"There isn't anything I wouldn't pardon you for," said Gid, very impressively.

Daisy paused and thought: "Was that outrageous Mame giggling aloud in the other room?"

"Then, would you be very much offended if I should ask you to allow me to make a sketch of your face? You know we artists are so continually on the watch for countenances that are not trivial and common. A face like yours, for instance, indicative of strength of character and—and ambition perhaps."

Gid was smiling broadly.

"You don't know how complimented I'd feel," he said.

"I'm glad to hear you say so. Will you sit for me a little while to-day. To tell the plain truth, I've begun work without any model, and I don't like it but like you, yet." And she uncovered the easel.

Gid sat for an hour, with eminent satisfaction to both.

"You come every morning now, and Daisy made hay. Mame Hallett was always present, but always deeply engrossed with her writing. Maclean could come no more, his vacation being at an end. Gid was becoming entangled in the meshes. His remarks amused her not at all.

"What I can't understand is, how you can paint so well, at your age," he said, one day. "I guess you are I more than 20, are you?"

"Not much more," said Daisy.

"Then I guess I'll be about two years older than you in September."

Daisy faltered:

"Are you after a prize—Well, that's good age to begin business. You ought to succeed.

Gid—Own fault if I don't. (Spoke through his teeth and over his shoulder). I guess I've got money enough to back me."

Daisy—That's a bright boulent.

"There, how am I getting along with the picture?

"Well, I guess I'd be pretty fortunate to get as good a one again. What do you mean to do with it, any way?

Daisy—Do with it? Hang it, why, put it on exhibition, I suppose.

Gid—You wouldn't sell it, I suppose to me?

Daisy, slowly—Well, frankly, I'd rather keep it at home.

Gid suddenly—I wish I had one of you!

Daisy raising her voice—Mame, please come here and criticise.

Gid was certainly in the net. When the sittings were at an end he summoned courage to ask permission to call at Daisy's home. Daisy was very pleasant

"To call?" she said, smiling. "Really, I should like to ask you; but, you see, we are going to the seaside next

"I'm sure Daisy greatly surprised when they received, some two hours later, by messenger, an invitation to join the young gentleman that same day for a ramble in the park.

"The assurance!" exclaimed Miss Hallett. "We—and they! Ramble in the park, indeed! Saub them, gorgeously, dear?"

"Saub them!" repeated Daisy. "You forget, dear; I can't saub any model. On the contrary, we must accept."

And immediately she dispatched word to that effect by the messenger, asking Maclean and his friend to call for them in a hack.

At the appointed hour Maclean arrived, alone.

"It's all right," he explained. "Gid was detained; he'll meet us at the place—I mistrust station."

They reached the station ahead of time, and sat down on a platform bench.

Just then Miss Hallett discovered she was parching with thirst, and Maclean moved upon an opposite adjournment to a neighboring drug-store, for soda-water.

"Are two any gay," said Daisy dotterpitately, "and I will wait here. Mr. Foster may arrive at any moment, and I am not at all thirsty."

She fell into a reverie as they hurried off, from which she was presently aroused by the excited voice of the station doorkeeper: "Local omnibus!"

"That's to way to come up! You want to come up the other door, and pick your tickets."

"O, I'll lose my ticket," cried an impatient, rather nasal voice, and Daisy, looking up, saw Gid Foster, crimson-faced with hurrying through the heat. "She, afterward, in dee riding hit appearance to Miss Hallett, declared, "Do you know, he came up the west stairs, and really, I believe he must have vaulted the gate; for no train was passing, and of course the gate was shut. Yes, he must have scrambled over that high fence; he looked as red as a turkey, too!"

"Ah," said she, with half a smile "You have come! Well, perhaps you'd like to see your ticket and deposit it. The others will believe directly, and wean meet me next train."

It was not bad at all, at the park. They loafed awhile, viewed the menagerie, consumed the small, and brought up at the restaurant. It happening to be a concert afternoon, the restaurant was very much crowded. The ladies wanted at the door with Maclean, and Gid went ahead to find seats. The lad no hesitation in asking a strange gentleman to relinquish his table in favor of the "ladies in our party." The stranger looked inquired and inquired, "Where m—(naughty word) do you want me to go? Out in the dark?"

Other seats were vacant at that moment, and Daisy and Mame came up smiling; they had simply taken the stranger's remark. The latter looked crestfallen. Daisy's beauty was

"Then I'll call his coming, and leave it open.

Arriving late next morning, Miss Hallet found Daisy in her easy-chair, studying over a letter.

"What are you doing precious?" asked Mame, throwing down her crocheting materials.

"I'm considering a proposal."

"Indeed! That's diversion. You must have gotten here at seven. How funny the portrait looks! It's just thing! If he could only see it!"

Daisy frowned, at "Down-our-way."

"I'd like to burn the old thing."

"But you couldn't, dear; thank fortune there's no fire to tempt you."

"Listen to this letter," said Daisy, and began to read aloud:

"MY DEAREST DAISY: (What I say dearest, I mean it in the sense of a little sister.) Though I have written so much of late, I do believe you will be glad to hear from me. Since that I have come to the conclusion that I have come to a little more than I ought to do, in the matter of expense. I am sorry for your sake, I intend to be very long and cobbling, belong to the same family as this common earth woman, the landlord. Their ladies have thirty segments in my spines. Besides this cheerful discovery, I feel lonely found in the real several dead worms with large chinted infectious, vegetable lungs, and other objects. It has been supposed that lee was free from the importies of the water upon whose surface it was frozen, but this discovery is against that theory.—Philadelphia Press.

BUTTERNS, considering they are such small affairs, are attracting a great deal of attention. In Munich a laboratory has been established to study their forms and habits, and a book which was issued in 1280 has lately been re-read because it was behind the times. Every medical journal is pretty sure to have some item of news about bacteria.

home, had angled for him, to his great knowledge. And now he's had his uncle a thing or two. He had already told him a little about Daisy and his matrimonial hopes.

"A nice way to treat Mabel Chancegroaled Mr. Fuller. "I'd like to know if I'm a beggar of your Southern sense of honor."

"Use higher ambitions," said Gid "Very well; go ahead, and see what you'll bring up."

Gid gave his head a little toss.

"I guess there isn't many girls he would be glad of a chance at me."

Gid had started off to see Daisy and receive his answer. Of course, he she a fool, and deserve the low no-honor. But gradually stole on reversal. He thought a fine bunch of roses and carried to the studio, running briskly up the stairs.

Daisy was alone; she sat examining a number of new flower studies. She smiled, and took his flowers, a shilly. She motioned to the chair. "Drop down," she said; "you look tired."

Gid drew up a chair, and opened the ball.

"You received my note?"

"Your note? O, yes, of course."

Gid's confidence was unmistakable.

"And what do you think of the idea?"

"What idea? I didn't get it."

"Why, I thought you meant it all as a joke, of course. I hope you did, she said, frankly, "because you know, I call, for, you ought to know, though perhaps you don't know, I am a lady bird dreadful if I thought you'd lead to anything else—a joke, pretty, calm, and smiling inside.

"Well, I'm sorry, I'm—I'm—The engagement to a gentleman who is now in Europe?"

Gid turned pale.

"Engaged!" he cried, tremulously. "Why, for that matter, so am I! If I'd know any engaged to be for you."

Daisy rose, with a grave expression.

"I am sorry to hear you say so. I have heard so much about Southern honor."

"But you won't decide at once," he stammered. "Only promise me to think it over!"

Daisy looked at him coldly.

"I think you could not have understood me. I said that I was engaged. there is nothing further for me to say, and—will you please excuse me?" She turned to enter the other room, and Gid had no choice but to retreat. He was in such a state of mind, relieve disappointment and chagrin, that he left his hat lying upon the sofa, and bolted out unremembered, and down into the street. He ran almost a block before he discovered why people were staring at him. How he hated to go back! But the hat was gone, and he was just a little close over mincemeat and pumpkin. He therefore returned, and climbed the stairs softly, hoping that she might still be in the room and would hear him and let him in.

But, as he reached the third landing, he was greeted with a most startling little drama. Not only Daisy, but Mame and Mabel were in the room, home, had angled for him, to his great knowledge. And now he's had his uncle a thing or two. He had already told him a little about Daisy and his matrimonial hopes.

Debts and Standing Armies.

The following table of the debts and armies of the six leading governments of Europe is, to say the least, interesting and suggestive:

	National Debt.	Standing Armies.	Peace Footing.
France	$4,765,000,000	420,000	441,374
Germany	1,875,000,000	445,374	395,794
Austria-Hungary	2,500,000,000	395,794	355,732
Italy	2,375,000,000	215,732	195,732
Spain	2,750,000,000	195,732	66,241
Russia	5,000,000,000	66,241
Totals	$19,000,000,000	2,333,073

The enormous French debt is due to the German war indemnity, which was $1,000,000,000, which was the total cost $747,000,000. The Austrian debt is equal to 28 per cent. of the wealth of the empire, and taxation absorbs 15 per cent. of its entire income. Italy's taxation is the most serious of any in the world. It amounts to 35 per cent. of the entire income of the kingdom, which is double the European average, and three times that of Great Britain. This is because a nation "$2,000,000 of poor people has to support a standing army of three-quarters of a million of soldiers. No wonder Europe is on a war footing, and really dares no large a population of very poor people. The condition of Italy is shown by the numbers of wretched Italians who, when they reach our shores, are willing to work for the merest pittance.—Demorest's Monthly.

A NEW method of fastening the strings of eyglass pieces is introduced by the Mason & Hamlin Organ and Piano Company, which is regarded as a great improvement and improvement over ends, making the instrument music richly modern, and so well as to attract the attention of the public to the merits of their organs.—Boston Journal.

THERE seems to be no limit to the fishes and vagaries connected in the name of religion and by peculiar sects. A correspondent of the New York Evening Telegram visited some religious fanatics in the most northern capital of Eastern Siberia, Yakutsk, where he found a people that outdo the Shakers. They claim to avoid the use of meat, tobacco and liquors, and all the nudes are eunuchs. The writer saw juvenile cases of the younger members of the sect who had been initiated into the brotherhood by their fanatical parents or relatives long before they could understand the meaning of the rites they were compelled to undergo." These very peculiar people are called Skopts.—Dr. Foote's Health Monthly.

This will be present, if the grievous and sometimes disastrous, bodily disturbance prevailing in the system, when the circulating organ is neglected or only half regulated. Just take your stomach and bowels topsy-turvy with calomel, blue pill, aloes and senna, and such like trash. If you persist in doing so, expect to suffer the consequence—death-blows. No man or woman ever put, with impunity, universal his gastric engine into a tempest. The execution of life is promoted and continued expeditiously, the fire, without the aid of such destructive agents as a drug shop. The secretion of bile

Girls may think they can reform the man they marry, should read a recent decision by the Supreme court of Iowa. It was a divorce case brought by a wife because her husband was a confirmed drunkard. This was not denied, but it was developed in evidence that she knew of his intemperate habits when she married him, and married him hoping to reform him. The judge of the court of last appeal denied her the divorce in these short words: "You voluntarily chose a drunkard for a husband, and you should discharge the duties of a drunkard's wife. His failure to keep a pledge of reformation made before marriage does not justify you in deserting him. Having knowingly married a drunkard, you must make yourself content with the sacred relationship." The scene cried. But girls remember, that you can never reform a man after marriage.

American Literary Women.

The death of Mary Cummer Hudson is the latest breach in American authorship. She was at one time the most attractive writer on the Independent, and Bowen has never been able to fill her place. The most interesting feature, however, in her life, is her intimacy with the sisters Alice and Phebe Cary, whose memoirs she gave the world in a very attractive form. The Carys were the most remarkable pair of sisters New York ever contained. They came bitter poor and endured great privation while building up a reputation, which eventually brought a competence. They lived, however, long enough to win the admiration of the best intellects of the day, and bore an important part in founding Syrosis, which is the most admirable club in this city. To return to Mrs. Hudson, she is reminded by her death of that brilliant array of female writers which has so recently passed away. Among these may be mentioned Sarah Parton (Fanny Fern), the Cary sisters, Miss Chubbuck (Fanny Forrester), also Amelia B. Weely, Mrs. Osgood, Anna Cora Mowatt, Elizabeth Oakes Smith and Lydia Maria Child. It may be said that Mrs. Hudson was one of the few female writers who won a position in Washington, and commanded the respect of the highest dignitaries of the Nation.

The success of these clever women should not be mentioned with a view of leading others to depend on literature. Without going into details, the painful fact is everywhere apparent that both journalism and book-making are too crowded to allow any encouragement. Coming down from literature to other employments, the female population in this city is so disproportionally great that even the struggle for existence becomes intense. A few days ago a crowd of women thronged a public business to a degree that excited general inquiry. It was explained by the fact that an advertisement for a girl in an office appeared that morning and a situation which hardly yielded a meager living was sought for by hundreds, all or whom, with but one exception, were disappointed. It was a sad spectacle, but such is the reality. The poor shop girls, or "white slaves," as they are sometimes called, may be objects of pity, but not more so than the bookbinders, vest hands, cap makers and followers of a score of other employments. Type-writing is a very neat kind of work but is entirely overdone. Telegraphy probably pays the best of all female employments, but there are a hundred applications for every vacancy. The only kind of employment that is not overdone is housework, and we all know that American girls are above the kitchen. Was a pity that this ridiculous notion of taste should be a bar to usefulness!—New York Letter to Utica Herald.

New Things in Watermelons.

"Any new varieties this year?"

"Well, we have the vanilla and the onion flavored watermelons. They are got by injecting the vanilla flavor or a bit of leaven into the stem while the melon is growing. The flavor is taken up by the pulp and makes a delicious combination. Only epicures know of this wrinkle, and we therefore have few of the cultured species on sale. You can get a toothsome dish by plugging a melon, injecting a little Zon cinnet, restoring the plug, and allowing the wine to be taken up by the fruit. But, beware; the combination is as seductive as Roman punch."

"Any new ways of preparing the melon for the table?"

"Well, I've been eating melons for forty years, and I will prefer them plain. Some of my customers, however, like 'em mixed. One of my best boarding-house customers has watermelon salad every Sunday in the season. She prepares it, she says, just as she does lettuce—cuts the red part of the melon up into bits and adds pepper, salt, vinegar, and oil. It ought to make 'em sick, but she says her boarders just fight for it. Another family that I know of pour molasses on their melons. A good many people, I believe, always add a squeeze of lemon to the fruit. A Boston family that used with me for a year put sugar to have their melons turn red. Just rips and don't haggle about the price when they get 'em to suit. They have the melons cut into little strips, and eat 'em with cold boiled corn. But, as I said, lemon is the fad. I like 'em plain."—Philadelphia Press Times.

AMERICAN COATS-OF-ARMS.

Labor Recognized in the Heraldry of the New World.

An interesting subject—one that has not yet received the attention to which it is entitled—is that of the recognition of industry in what might be called American heraldry. The coats-of-arms and official emblems of old-world nations, as might be expected, are monopolized by ideas of pride and warlike power. With popular rights and peaceful industries the founders of European dynasties and kingdoms had no sympathy. No less was it to be expected, on the other hand, that self-governing communities of frugal and industrious folk, set in a land where everything was to be won by arduous effort, should embrace every opportunity to lend the labor which was the corner-stone of the fabric of their prosperity—of their very existence.

A glance through such a work as Prof. Hoagit's "American Constitutions," or Admiral Preble's "History of the Flag of the United States of America," will not fail to reveal an almost universal recognition of industry and commerce. The most notable omission is in the case of the seal and arms. Is not one of the designs suggested by or to the committee appointed July 4, 1776, to prepare a device for the great seal of the United States—a committee whose members were Franklin, Adams, and Jefferson—was there any recognition of the peaceful arts. Adams' design was the "Choice of Hercules"—what a pity that upon our passports and commissions we do not behold delineated "the hero resting on a club, Virtue pointing to her rugged mountain on one hand and personifying him to Ascend; and Sloth glaring at her flowery paths of pleasure, wantonly reclining on the ground, displaying the charms both of her eloquence and person, to seduce him into vice!" Franklin was for a design representing the wheltalig of Pharaoh; Jefferson for the "Children of Israel in the Wilderness, plus Hengist and Horsa." Among the supporters in the various designs afterward reported are to be found American Indians, Roman soldiers, "maidens with loose auburn tresses," "knights in arms, with bloody lances," but never a husbandman or an artisan, and on the great seal finally adopted June 20, 1782, nothing typifies labor, unless it be the uninspired pyramid which scoffers have insisted upon regarding as prophetic of the Washington monument.

Very different, however, is it with the arms of the different states; there the omission to recognize trade or industry is the comparatively rare exception.

Maine has as her supporters a husbandman leaning on his scythe and a sailor resting on an anchor.

New Hampshire shows a ship on the stocks with American banners displayed, and a group of busy shipwrights.

Vermont places beneath her towering pine-tree three erect sheaves and a red cow—a nobler beast than any of the Hons, griffins, boars, and bears that ramp and roar through the forests of European heraldry.

Massachusetts has a decidedly warlike coat-of-arms, with her bolted and moccasined Indian, and her "dexter arm clothed and grasping a broad-sword," and Rhode Island's "snacks" has no reference to maritime interests. Nor do Connecticut's three vines, supported and fruited, relate to viticulture, but, instead, to the three original plantations of Hartford, Windsor, and Weatherfield.

New York's arms have no recognition of labor or trade, if we except the two vessels approaching each other on the Hudson.

New Jersey, however, displays three plows in an escutcheon, makes Ceres one of the supporters, and takes as crest a horse's head.

Pennsylvania's supporting horses are of the rampant "old war-horse" breed, but her shield is charged with peaceful emblems—a plow; on a sea navy proper, a ship under full sail; and a stalk of maize. This coat-of-arms was taken chiefly from the old seal of the city of Philadelphia, adopted in 1701, which had in three of its quarters a balance, a wheat sheaf, and a ship sailing upon an ocean.

Delaware shows in one division of her arms shield a cow, and in the other a sheaf of wheat and a bundle of lest tobacco. The crest is a ship under full sail, and the supporters are a farmer and a hunter.

Maryland, in adopting the arms of Lord Baltimore, was so fortunate as to obtain as supporters a fisherman and plowman.

Virginia, on the reverse of her great seal, which is nothing if not classical, shows Ceres, with her cornucopia in one hand and an ear of wheat in the other.

West Virginia has an encyclopedic coat-of-arms. On the dexter side of her ivy-twined rock is a farmer, clothed in the traditional tunning shirt of the mountain region, his right arm resting on the plow-handles, and his left supporting a woodman's ax, with, at his feet, a sheaf of wheat and a corn-stalk. On the sinister is a miner with a pick-ceral at his feet, while an anvil, on which rests a sledge-hammer, is partly seen.

North Carolina has on her shield a Cora—with the cornucopia in one hand and in the other three wheat ears.

Georgia has always celebrated trade and industry with elaborate enthusiasm. When George II. chartered the colony, in 1732, one face of the seal represented a president and laborious colony of silk-worms, sericulture being the special object of the new settlement. When it became a crown colony, in 1754, its seal showed on one side the genius of the colony presenting a skein of silk to the king. The convention of 1777 adopted a seal whereon was shown "an elegant house and other buildings, with sheep and cattle, a river running through the same with a ship under full sail"—a description leaving not a little doubt as to whether the river ran through the elegant house, or the sheep. The present seal, adopted in 1798, bears the following elaborate device: "A view of the seashore, with a ship bearing the flag of the United States riding at anchor near a wharf, receiving on board hogsheads of tobacco and bales of cotton, emblematic of the exports of the state; at a small distance, a boat landing from the interior of the state with hogsheads, etc., on board, representing her internal traffic; in the back part, a man plowing, and at a small distance a flock of sheep in different postures, shaded by a flourishing tree; the motto, 'Agriculture and Commerce.'" Not a bad coat-of-arms for the thriving southern commonwealth.

Florida places a side-wheeled steamboat on the river in the middle ground of her coat-of-arms.

Arkansas crowds the shield upon the bosom of her eagle with a steamboat, a bee-hive and plow, and a sheaf of wheat.

Tennessee places in one division of her coat-of-arms a plow, a wheat-sheaf, and a stalk of cotton, with the word, "Agriculture." The lower half occupied by a loaded barge, with the word, "Commerce."

Ohio, which was without any legalized seal for more than half a century, places the familiar wheat-sheaf on her shield, and has as supporters a farmer with sheaves of wheat and implements of agriculture, in the distance a locomotive and train of cars and a smith with anvil and hammer, and also water and a steamboat.

Indiana's buffalo is being scared over the prairies by the resounding ax of a lusty wood-chopper.

Iowa has on her arms a sheaf and field of standing wheat, with a sickle and other farming implements, a lead furnace and a pile of pig lead, a plow just left by a citizen soldier, and, in the rear of all, a steamboat upon the Mississippi.

Wisconsin has upon her shield an anchor and a mechanic's arm, grasping a hammer, a plow, a spade and pick-ax crossed, and two stalks of grain. The supporters are a sailor and a shirt-sleeved laborer, with a pick-ax.

Minnesota shows a farmer, plowing, his gun resting on a stump, while an Indian recedes before him toward "his bright home in the setting sun."

California blazons upon her shield a hardy miner, his pick, seeking for gold, and two clipper ships upon the bay.

Oregon has at the base of her shield sheaves of wheat, a plow, a rake, and a pick. In the upper half is a landscape with an emigrant wagon, and in the background a sea bearing a steamship and a brig flying American colors.

Kansas displays a river and a steamboat, a settler's cabin and a man plowing, and a train of ox-wagons moving westward.

Nevada has a benefitting coat-of-arms. It shows a square mile, a tunnel from which a miner is pushing a car of ore; a plow, a sheaf, and a sickle, a train of railroad cars passing a mountain gorge, and a telegraph line.

Colorado bears on the lower half of her shield a miner's pick and mallet crossed.

Of the territories, Utah has a beehive on a stand surrounded by flowers, with bees hovering near it. Washington's "female figure with flowing tresses" has an anchor by her side; to her right a city with spires and domes and a steam vessel; on her left a log cabin and a pine forest. Dakota's shield an anvil and agricultural implements appear in decidedly incongruous juxtaposition with an Indian spearing a buffalo. Arizona is represented by a miner, dressed in shirt and trousers and a broad-brimmed hat, resting on pick and spade. Montana shows plow, pick, and spade in the foreground of her shield. Wyoming displays in one compartment of her escutcheon a railroad and a train of cars; in another are agricultural implements.

Thus are labor and commerce represented in American heraldry.—New York Mail and Express.

The New York Mail and Express says that the Brooklyn bridge now earns about $1,300 a day, but it costs nearly $3,000 a day to pay interest on its bonds and the expenses of operation. However, five years hence, when the rapid transit system of Brooklyn is thoroughly established, the bridge may pay its own way.

Concise Record of the Week.

EASTERN.

The burning of the Brooklyn (N. Y.) Orphan Asylum, the first reports of which were confined to a few lines, has developed into a frightful horror. There were between 700 and 800 children in the building at the time, and it was at first believed—or at least the public was made to believe—that all of them had been rescued. A few hours afterward a gang of laborers were set to work clearing away the debris. These workmen soon came upon the charred remains of half a dozen children. Similar finds were made at intervals, until finally the burned remains of twenty-two unfortunate little ones had been brought to light. Several orphans are missing, and it is not unlikely that the loss of life will reach thirty or forty. It would appear that the institution was little better than a firetrap, and that, although there was a large fire-plug in the yard, there was not a foot of hose about the premises. For some reason last known to themselves, the players of a charge have maintained a pouting silence in regard to the origin of the disaster or to the possible number of the dead. Much praise is given to the heroic but unfortunate Sister Mary Josephine, who, at the cost of her own life, saved, by her exertions, the lives of the scholars in the building.

The Cable Railway Company, of New York have issued 15,000 bonds aggregating $15,000,000, and to secure the payment of the same have transferred all of their property and franchises to the Farmers' Loan and Trust Company.

The New England Tobacco Growers' Association adopted a memorial to Congress asking the abolition of internal revenue tax on tobacco and cigars, the remission of duty on imported wrappers, and declaring that reciprocity treaties were of doubtful utility.

A banking house in New York took $1,500,000 in gold, bonds of the Black Island road, to run fifty years, at a figure above 105.

Mrs. Emma Britton, a wealthy and aristocratic widow of 40, living on Staten Island, has scandalized her family by marrying her coachman, a sixty-youth of 21.

Four thousand coal-miners on the Monongahela River west of Pittsburgh, for an advance of half a cent a bushel. The operators say they will close the mines indefinitely rather than accede to the demand.

Harrigan & Hart's Theater in New York was burned. The loss was $200,000, uninsured. A large amount of MS. music belonging to Dave Braham was destroyed.

Four business blocks at Cambridge, N. Y., were burned, the loss reaching $175,000. A school building at Beverly, Mass., was destroyed, the children getting out safely.

A canal-boat moored to the dock at the foot of Columbia street, Brooklyn, sprung a leak and sunk so quickly that a boy and a girl who were on board were drowned.

WESTERN.

J. Henry Bohart, the civil engineer who built the famous loop on the Southern Pacific road, was frozen to death in the street at Chicago after leaving that island.

An armed mob of 100 men made an attack on the County House at Traverse, Sebastian County, Ark., and removed the safe supposed to contain the county records. The attacking party consisted of women, who proclaimed to be the county seat. The records were precisely removed from the safe, and the men in command at the first played on them. It is feared that only the presence of troops can prevent bloodshed.

At Wausau, Wisconsin, Victor Delia was butchered with an ax by his brother Tonio. Delia belonged to the Presbyterian Church, and the murderer has for some time been trying the prayer cure upon his victim, to no benefit. The horrible deed was accompanied by shouts of religious frenzy.

Specimens of rock and earth yielding an average of $5,000 gold to the ton have been picked up on several farms in Clermont County, Ohio.

Four robbers burst open the door of Israel Smith's house at Grandville, Mich., argued and blunderbussed him, and departed with $231 as the reward of their labors.

W. F. McArthur, District Attorney, was shot at Neenah, Wis., by Paul Steiner, who charges that he had been swindled by McArthur in a business transaction.

John P. St. John's newspaper organ, the Kansas Prohibitionist, has collapsed at Leavenworth.

All the horses used on the stage line between Bismarck and Fort Yates have been killed, because of an outbreak of glanders in its most virulent form.

Masked men entered the farm-house of Harvey Jackson, near Bloomington, Ohio, bound the old man and his wife and daughter, and demanded money. The robbers took two threes of every Mrs. Jackson and threatened to fire it, when she revealed the hiding-place of $[illegible]. The victims were left bound on the floor until nearly daylight, with the front doors open to the piercing winds.

SOUTHERN.

A fire at Baltimore destroyed the extensive oyster-packing establishment of H. J. Bertrand & Co., and damaged that of T. H. Schold & Co., the total loss being $[illegible].

A large iron bridge in process of erection near the Exposition buildings at New Orleans fell, carrying three workmen, one of whom was taken out dead.

Six masked robbers broke into the house of Henry Workenour, at Wheeling, W. Va., on Friday last. Mr. Workenour and his wife, and got away with $1,000.

Bishop William F. Dickerson, colored, of the African M. E. church, died at Columbia, S. C.

The trouble between Samuel Mullen, chief of the Installation department of the World's Exposition, at New Orleans, and the exhibitors has been settled to the satisfaction of the exhibitors. The board of management appointed a committee to investigate all complaints against the installation department, and where there is a real grievance correct it immediately by the management, which guarantees a prompt remedy. The Exhibitors' Association unanimously accepted this arrangement.

A fast train on the Baltimore and Ohio road jumped the track near Brownsburg, Indiana. Fifteen persons were injured, among them being Congressman Shively of Indiana, Indianapolis Director Gifford of Dunsta, Frederick A. Wheeler and wife of Baltimore, and J. W. Milnand wife of Chicago.

William Hulse, an old citizen, became insane in St. Tammany hall, Louisiana, and, upon the refusal of the clerk of a store to take a Confederate bill, used a pick-fork in a threatening manner. He was arrested and lodged in prison at Madisonville, but violently asserted that he would be released. A band of men under cover of darkness surrounded the jail and organized on the cell occupied by Hulse, and departed after riddling him with bullets.

Three masked robbers, after vainly searching the residence of Elias Marling, near Mineral, W. Va., applied red-hot pokers to his back, burned off his feet with live coals, and at last succeeded him in signing and sealing a note for $[illegible] payable on demand. The unfortunate victim was finally released by neighbors, but received sufficiently to repay him the story of his torture.

The North-bound express train on the New Orleans and Northeastern Railroad was thrown off the track by obstructions near Purvis, Miss. A number of passengers were injured, and the engineer and fireman were killed.

James Buckman and his son, the former being one of the wealthiest men in Pleasants County, West Virginia, have been arrested for shoplifting at Parkersburg, for years small thefts have been committed where the Buckmans resided, and hundreds of second-hand articles have been found in their possession.

WASHINGTON.

Albert Hawkins, the coachman for all the notorious show crowd's time, has been re-engaged by Gov. Cleveland.

A distinguished officer of the navy says, apropos of the Nicaraguan dilemma, that if the treaty is ratified the United States will be obliged to provide itself with modern fleets and modern forts in order to maintain its position.

The Dupont statute was unveiled at Washington, Senator Bayard delivering the oration.

It is reported that the President-elect has selected Benjamin Harrison for Attorney General, and William Windom for Secretary of the Interior.

Second-Assistant Postmaster General Lyman has resigned, to enter the service of the Bell Telephone Company.

Sergeant Hilliard, of the Signal Service, who was recently sent to Nebraska by Secretary Lincoln in search of Capt. Heyzade, is to be court-martialed for filling the private papers of Lieut. Greely.

The Secretary of the Treasury lately received a letter from a resident of Paris, Russia, inclosing a $400 note of the Confederate States, which he says he inherited from his uncle, and wants it exchanged for currency. The note has been returned to the sender, with the information that it is worthless.

POLITICAL.

THREE Cabinet portfolios are said to have been already decided upon. Senator Bayard is to be Secretary of the Treasury, Senator Garland Attorney-General, and Gen. Nicholls Secretary of the Navy. The Washington correspondent of the Chicago Tribune telegraphs that journal this list of Cabinet goods:

A prominent Democrat says that three Cabinet positions have been settled. Bayard, Senator Bayard for the Treasury, Senator Garland, of Arkansas, for Attorney General, and ex-Gov. Nicholls, of New Jersey, for Secretary of the Navy. Mr. Garland's name is the 17th Cabinet has been that name New York is to be represented in the Cabinet through the President and Vice President, it is confirmed. Miscellaneous Brevities.

J. Milo Eaton is in Saginaw this week.

The Board of Supervisors meet next Tuesday.

A humming baby girl helps to make times lively at the house of W. J. McCough.

Maiden apostrophs soon to have a match factory, to be located there by a Chicago company.

Geo. Burton was killed last Saturday by a falling limb, where he was at work in the woods.

Mr. Moore, of Manistee, spent Christmas in Charlevoix, the guest of Jos. Hybaud and family.

Fred H. Aldrich, late of East Jordan, is now in the law office of his uncle, S. S. Calkins, of Cadillac.

During the year 1884 there were put on record with the register of Deeds 775 deeds and 448 mortgages.

C. G. Paten is putting water power machinery into his saw-mill at Advance, and will soon have it in operation.

Ward Bros. have purchased the grist mill at Hayes, and will make numerous improvements in the machinery.

The firm of Johnson & Hitchcock, of Kansas City, has dissolved and been succeeded by that of W. S. Johnson & Co.

The Boyne Statesman publishes the names of small boys who are delinquent, and has evidently starved one a horse's ass.

The Cadillac Times says that Mrs. Judge Nelson is entitled to considerable credit for her efforts in behalf of the poor of that city.

L. A. DeLamarter, well known here as the popular agent of E. T. Brown & Co., of Grand Rapids, died in that city last Friday, and was buried Sunday.

A. D. Cruickshank has been appointed Supervisor of Charlevoix township for the unexpired term of Orlando Blair, who was elected County Treasurer.

Some one cut evergreens for Christmas decorations in the S. L. congregational cemetery, which had been left to beautify the cards. The offender was not caught.

The case of scarlet fever in the family of Mr. Bryant, mentioned last week, was "not so" as other fevers, since having received two weeks before it was reported to us.

A block marriage took place at Cheyenne county, Nebraska, Christmas week. The groom was defendant in a suit for seduction, and in the capacity of a juror, and a jolly same-sooner at home and abroad.

We have had almost constant rain-storms last Saturday, and sleighing is nearly gone. LATER.—Wednesday morning the wind and weather changed, and everything is sleigh-ing again.

The competition of McCabe's bus to Petoskey has caused Prof. J. Sinnah's line to build a similar bus with stove for warming, thus given us comfortable transportation accommodations between here and Petoskey.

The interests of Elk Rapids and Charlevoix are identical, both towns are "upon a railroad. Which will pick the fruit in the shape of sight of way, good depot grounds, etc., the C. & L., or the Chicago & West Michigan?

By an advertisement in a copy of the Saint Louis, we learn that our friend G. F. Lance, well known in some Charlevoix people, is now engaged in the harness business at that place. We wish him success in his new enterprise.

The covered bus with a fire in it which is running between this place and Petoskey, is said to be very comfortable. A lady who ventured in it said "I built in request my wraps and if I had my knitting work, could have knit all the way over.—Petoskey Democrat.

Mrs. J. A. Hawkins and daughter Lilie, and Mrs. M. DeDee, went to Grand Rapids on Monday. They will visit also in Detroit, Hastings, and elsewhere. We are informed that Mrs. DeDee will not return in the spring, but intends to go into business for herself somewhere.

The Progress says that the new clients of Elk Rapids "have all made good sales this week, the week of all weeks in the year, this cannot fell from trade during this season, and it is likely to be later on in the winter. We believe though, that the hard times will lighten up by the opening of spring, if not earlier."

Perry Hannah, of Traverse City, while in Grand Rapids recently, said to a reporter of the Leader that "an Inclined Traverse region a small array, or men will be employed this winter getting out cord wood to be shipped to Chicago for ship building. Dock ends is unequaled for ship building purposes, and we have a large supply of it to fill the demand."

The Old Mission correspondent of the Grand Traverse Herald, gives us the following table of shipments of fruit on that other peninsula: the shipment of fruit alone during the season of 1884: Apples, 39,414 bbls; pears, 4864 bbls; plums, 23 bbls; prunes, 27 bbls; crab apples, 1084 bbls; cherries, 264 bbl.; raspberries, 41 bbl.; currants, 14 bbl.; strawberries, 217 bbl.; wheat, 625 bbl.; beans, 20 bbl.; potatoes, 10,287 bbl.; ruta bagas, 33 bbl.; grapes, 3,200 pounds; 400 squashes, boxes, 41 kegs, cider, 400 barrels. Large shipments of strawberries were made by rail from Traverse City, bringing the total shipments of this fruit from the peninsula up to, probably 450 bushels.

The business of Elk Rapids for the season of 1884, is shown by a table of receipts and shipments published in the Progress. Receipts—General merchandise, 872 tons; wheat, 1,267 bushels; oats, 4,753 bushels; corn, 2,204 bushels; iron ore, 35,200 tons; limestone, 1,100 tons. Shipments—Flour, 1,000 barrels; pig iron, 16,000 tons; alcohol, 500 barrels, acetate of lime, 2,200 tons; hardwood lumber, 1,500,000 feet.

We learn that Mrs. Cunningham was severely burned a few days ago, by falling against a stove. She was alone at the time, and the iron door in the cellar was open. She was found in the cellar, unconscious, and the probabilities are that in attempting to build a fire she burned herself, and in the excitement, not unlikely the open iron door, fell through. She has been in feeble health some time, and her recovery is doubtful.

Nothing tends to demoralize trade so much and to create hard times as the cry of hard times. The habit of anticipating, of saying, "I told you so," and "You will see," does more to create distrust in business circles than do all the failures in the country. A hopeful outlook, a spirit that says the business horizon is dark but not dun, an expressed confidence in the present and in the future, will do more to revive trade than anything else that can be done.—Tradesman.

With snow falling steadily and winter still triumphant, there is a certain mockery in the sudden appearance of one and another seed catalogue. "Nick's Floral Guide" leads the van, and as usual sends no commendation, its solid merit having long ago given it a firm place in popular affection. The mainstay of flowers takes the usual list of new seedlings in both vegetables and flowers, and with its bright flower frontispiece is quite worthy a prominent place on the sitting-room table, while the Illustrated Monthly has long been a faithful guide in all matters relating to the garden. James Vick, Rochester, N. Y., will send the Floral Guide to any address for 10 cents, which, if seeds are afterwards purchased, may be deducted from the order.

No Southern Administration from Cleveland.

The Albany correspondent of the Buffalo Evening News telegraphs as follows: "Contrary to general expectation, Gov. Cleveland has decided to remain in Albany during the interval between his resignation as governor and his inauguration as president. The governor has hired a house, and his sisters will keep house for him. The resignation will take place immediately on the assembling of the legislature, Jan. 6, and Lieut. Gov. Hill will at once take the chair."

Gov. Cleveland said last night in answer to an inquiry as to his stay in Albany: "It is a good deal more convenient here for meeting a good many people who always come to call on me in relation to public matters, and I have easier access to certain books and public records I want to consult in the interim. I shall make a run to Buffalo to attend the charity ball, making an exception of that, for I am crowded with invitations."

"You will not have any message to write, then, this year?"

"No, it has been suggested that the inaugural address will have some of the character of a message in outlining my policy. I hardly think much is expected in that line, beyond a very general statement of the principles that will govern my action. A good deal has been said about a southern administration, and I suppose some people are looking for assurances that we are not to have the government run in the interest of a section. The way I look at it is that no part of the country is to be treated any differently from any other part. Efforts have been made to raise a false alarm on this matter. I think it is the duty of every patriotic man to frown down any such sectional issues."

Burgess.

Happy New Year and no sleighing that is the way it looks at present.

Wm. B. Sayers is improving his real estate in section 16.

Wm. Gray was the recipient of a splendid Christmas present, and enough it was one day late,—a daughter.

Mrs. Lottie Long, who was very low with diphtheria, has nearly recovered.

Mr. Wallace Charlevoix, is spending the holidays with his son in law, Mr. Frank Kane.

The population of Hayes is still on the increase; Charles Howe is the happy father of a boy.

Mr. and Mrs. Dickenhoof, who were lately married, start for Elkhart, Ind., the first of next week.

It is rumored that one of the business men of Hayes has made an assignment.

Several parties are engaged in getting out tie posts, and piles in this section.

Three per cent is added to the taxes after to day.

THE HALL COMPLETED.

Charlevoix's New Public Building Ready for Occupancy.

The new village hall is completed, has been examined by the council, and without doubt will be formally accepted (except the furnace which is to be well tested before acceptance) and paid for at the regular meeting to-night.

The building is 50x60, two stories high, stone foundation wall, and walls veneered with brick; has tower and bell, jail, jailor's residence, engine room, offices, a large, light, and convenient hall, and is in all respects large enough to accommodate both the village and the county for a number of years, and we understand the council have unofficially agreed to offer it to the county at the January meeting of the board of supervisors, to be used for a court house and county jail, free of expense to the county as long as they choose to so occupy it. A resolution to this effect will doubtless pass the council to-night. The board of supervisors will serve their best interests by the acceptance of this generous offer on the part of the village.

We have heard frequent individual expressions that the building is equal to many ten thousand dollar building in other cities, although this cost but seven thousand, and the contractors themselves say they will not make a cent out of it. While we must regard any loss on the part of the builders, the people may congratulate themselves on getting so good a building for the money.

Wanted—Business Confidence.

If we stop a moment to consider the condition of the country, we can readily see that we are in possession of all the needful facilities for carrying forward a most successful business. Money is abundant, and can be obtained at a low rate of interest. Our mines of precious metals are still rich and are yielding abundantly. We have plenty of raw materials of every description. Our manufacturing plants are sufficient to supply the requirements of a very extensive home and export trade. Our farmers have been favored with an exceptionally large crop. Our carrying facilities both by rail and water were never better, and the charges for transportation are very low. We are at peace with all the world. National taxes are being rapidly reduced, and local taxes are not oppressive. The majority of our traders and manufacturers are solvent, the weak and rotten concerns being pretty well weeded out. The supplies of materials in the hands of the manufacturers and producers are not overabundant, if we except one or two classes of manufacturers which seem, in view of the restricted trade of this country, to be in excess of our requirements. What, then, is needed to give a revivifying influence to business? It is not capital for that is abundant. It is not facilities, for we have all needed issues. It is not farming on a more extensive foreign and domestic traffic. It is not lack or need of productions, for the wants of our fifty millions of people are daily multiplying. We want confidence.—Tradesman.

The Long and Short of It.

The Manistee Herald says: Publishing a newspaper is a pleasant and enjoyable business when times are lively and money flush, when the editor is put to no inconvenience to pay his paper and labor bills, and when he rubs with people how rapidly his subscription list is creeping up with a daily addition of several "paid in advance" subscribers. Then is the time to shape solid comfort in hurrying his pencil over the chain, white paper. He takes pleasure in publishing a bright and newsy, well printed sheet, and as he hurries along the streets of his prosperous and thriving village, "hosing" this one and that one for a choice bit of local news, he imagines himself the happiest of mortals. Indeed, he would think twice before exchanging his business for one less arduous and more lucrative.

On the other hand, dull times and a depressed money market affects the publisher as well as the merchant and in most cases the effect is even more striking and disastrous. It is then, his best subscribers are compelled to ask for "a little more time," that his job patronage falls off 50 per cent, and his heaviest advertising patrons either reduce their "space" or withdraw their "ad" altogether, until the times brighten up. In taking this course the merchant invariably blunders, for it is in dull times that the shrewd advertiser increases his space and redoubles his efforts to build up his business and promote his trade. Owing to this decrease of patronage the poor benighted scribe finds that it takes all his energy to successfully make both ends meet. It is then, his stock of perseverance and determination is called into play. The silver does not jingle in his pockets as in former times, and when he does take in a dollar he carefully and tenderly hoards it away to meet that confounded paper bill or to pay his help their last week's wages. It is then, the editor finds it necessary to curtail expenses to the very last notch. He discharges a part of his help, and, perhaps, lays off his coat and steps up to the "case" he abandoned years ago. It is then, the subscriber wonders why it is that the paper is not up to its usual stand ard. He cannot imagine for the life of him why the local columns are so scanty and devoid of interest, and when he glances at those three or four columns of stale "plates," he throws the paper aside and declares that it grows poorer with each succeeding issue. He really imagines that the editor is getting lazy, and just wishes he had the opportunity of giving him a few lessons on "how to successfully conduct a newspaper," but, of course, he knows the editor would take that as an insult, so he just drops into the postoffice and directs the postmaster to give due notice to that publisher that he wishes his paper stopped and that he shall no longer take it from the office. He has got tired of paying for such a useless sheet and the sooner the editor finds it out the better. Thus it is that the poor, over worked half-discouraged scribe finds little to encourage him in his now depressed condition. The money he is taking in little more than half pays the running expenses of his office, say nothing of surprising himself and family. Does he give up and declare that he is done with the newspaper business? Not much. His pride and half-dog grit tells him to hold on for better days are coming, and, instead of carving his luck, he shuts his teeth closer together while that little word "hope" carries him safely past the breakers, and lands him at last on firm and solid footing.

The Boom Coming.

The Minneapolis Daily Journal, a stalwart republican sheet, in predicting that 1885 will see a marked revival of prosperity throughout the country, gives as its reasons for its belief, among others, the following: "We have an idea that the policy of the incoming administration of Grover Cleveland will be the reverse, as far as possible, the financial policy of the preceding administrations in the matter of contraction. A step will be put to debt paying so far as possible. As few calls will be made for bonds as can be done under the discretion allowed by law. The heavy surplus in the treasury will be paid out in some manner and circulated among the people. Inflation, so far as the administration can influence it—and it can do a great deal—will take the place of contraction. As soon as money begins to circulate more freely, business will pick up. Goods will begin to move. Trade will revive. A demand for manufactured goods will cause the manufacturing establishments to re-open and to run on full time. In short, a business boom will set in."

M. E. Church.

The centennial week is being observed at the M. E. church. Pleasant and profitable meetings are held daily, and a general invitation is extended.

New Year sermon at the M. E. church next Sunday morning. At 6 o'clock love feast and praise service; preaching at 6.30. All are invited.

The pastor of the M. E. church, in behalf of the church and Sunday school, desires to express sincere thanks to all who helped to make the Christmas festival such a splendid success.

THE HALL COMPLETED.

Charlevoix's New Public Building Ready for Occupancy.

The new village hall is completed, has been examined by the council, and without doubt will be formally accepted (except the furnace which is to be well tested before acceptance) and paid for at the regular meeting to-night.

The building is 50x60, two stories high, stone foundation wall, and walls veneered with brick; has tower and bell, jail, jailor's residence, engine room, offices, a large, light, and convenient hall, and is in all respects large enough to accommodate both the village and the county for a number of years, and we understand the council have unofficially agreed to offer it to the county at the January meeting of the board of supervisors, to be used for a court house and county jail, free of expense to the county as long as they choose to so occupy it. A resolution to this effect will doubtless pass the council to-night. The board of supervisors will serve their best interests by the acceptance of this generous offer on the part of the village.

We have heard frequent individual expressions that the building is equal to many ten thousand dollar building in other cities, although this cost but seven thousand, and the contractors themselves say they will not make a cent out of it. While we must regard any loss on the part of the builders, the people may congratulate themselves on getting so good a building for the money.

Wanted—Business Confidence.

If we stop a moment to consider the condition of the country, we can readily see that we are in possession of all the needful facilities for carrying forward a most successful business. Money is abundant, and can be obtained at a low rate of interest. Our mines of precious metals are still rich and are yielding abundantly. We have plenty of raw materials of every description. Our manufacturing plants are sufficient to supply the requirements of a very extensive home and export trade. Our farmers have been favored with an exceptionally large crop. What, then, is needed to give a revivifying influence to business? It is not capital for that is abundant. It is not facilities, for we have all needed issues. Cranberry Culture in Michigan.

D. G. Leach, of Traverse City, was seen by a reporter of The Tradesman the other day, and questioned relative to the success of his experiment in cranberry culture on the marsh land near Walton Junction. He said that it was too soon to set the matter down as a success or a failure, as it requires fully four years to mature the plants for bearing. He has now several acres of swamp land under cultivation, having secured considerable quantities of Cape Cod and native plants, and there is every anticipation that the result will be amply satisfactory. The location selected is peculiarly adapted for the purpose, being so situated as to enable him to keep the plants flooded during the winter and spring, and unless some unforseen difficulty arises, Mr. Leach will soon be in a position to supply the Michigan markets with choice home-grown berries.

It will be news to many dealers to learn that northern Michigan is now one extensive cranberry marsh in successful cultivation, and the two citiers in the same locality are saying that end. Dr. W. H. Walker, of Fredhue, Wis., has ten acres of cranberries under cultivation near Grow Arbor, Leelanau county, and gentleman named Grolsbee and Barlow have engaged in the same business on a single scale near Leland. Dr. Walker's yield last season was enormous, averaging 120 barrels to the acre, and in places reaching a barrel to the square rod. He is rapidly increasing his bearing capacity, and will soon have one of the largest cranberry marshes in the west. The cultivation of the berry is also large and increasing, and also near South St. Marie.

Mr. Leach states that only short, cute marsh in tons is adapted to the cultivation of the cranberry, but known once secured a desirable location the only requisites are—cold water and air. The crop is by no means a sure one every season, but a good crop once in three years is sufficient to render the enterprise a paying investment.

Historical Society.

The next meeting of the historical society will be held on Tuesday evening, Jan. 6, 1885, at the residence of John Nicholls. A full attendance is requested. COMMITTEE.

Business Brevities.

The Lansing wagon factory will resume work after January 1, with a full force of men.

It is a curious fact that it is the protected industries that are suffering the most now. The iron, lumber, salt, cotton, silk and sugar trades are fairly paralyzed, while trades that have no protection are going along on the even tenor of their way.

Many of the blast furnaces around Pittsburg are to be started up at once. There is very little prospect of a boom for some months, but it is the universal opinion that the bottom prices have been reached, and that there will now be a steady demand for iron at stiffening prices, so those furnaces which have modern appliances and a favorable location are starting up again.

The American who took twenty lessons in Batrian for $5, exhibited his tour has returned with a fat pocket-book. Every amateur of the kind should be encouraged. We must keep even with the opera singers in some way.

Discussing the subject of animals London paper declares that the dragon is "held sacredly by the wings curls is tail upward to its mouth and chews hard obviously to pulp." This beats the performance of the Kilkenny cats.

In England there are but 227,000 land owners, while under the system of peasant farming of France there are 7,000,000 landholders in the republic. A farm of two acres is quite large, while those of a quarter of an acre are plentiful.

The religious opposition to cremation is re-enforced by opposition from the life insurance companies. They claim that it will interfere with the successful consent of policies by destroying the evidence as to the cause of death.

"Captain Jon," the local chief of the Washoe Indians, says there is a squaw living in the outskirts of Carson, Nev., who is nearly 150 years old. Her grandson, at the age of 90, was one of General Frémont's guides when he crossed the plains.

Every Mussulman is entitled to four wives and no more. The Sultan is the only man who is not bound by this rule. Every year on his birthday he is presented with a new wife—a sort of annual reminder, as it were, of the vanity of the position.

The inventor of an electric apparatus for deaf people claims that no ear is so dead that it cannot be made to hear, and that in many cases the apparatus will cure deafness. It may be concealed in a cane, umbrella handle, fan or any such article of convenience.

Off the Gulf coast of Texas is the Padre island, containing 300,000 acres and owned by no man known where. There are scores of claimants to the title, some of whom have already induced credulous Englishmen to sink $100,000 in ideal schemes of improvement.

A woman doctor in Boston achieved notoriety by making a fatal blunder. She prepared a mixture containing strychnine for one of her patients, and in the directions for a dose on the label she wrote "teaspoonful" instead of "drops." In about an hour the patient was dead.

The exports of wheat from all American ports for Sept. 1, 1883, to Aug. 4, 1884, were 97,004,600 bushels, as against 120,188,000 bushels for the corresponding period of 1882-83. This shows exactly the great decline in our wheat exports, and furnishes one cool explanation of the present low values.

Long articles have been written about the cholera bacillus, but a medical writer says our real knowledge of it may be summoned up by saying that it is shaped like a comma, that 40,000 to 60,000 of them placed lengthwise would make an inch, that it infests impure drinking water, favors the human intestines as an abode, and is supposed to cause cholera.

The beautiful Japanese lacquer, so appreciated by European amateurs, is growing scarce and much more costly. This is due to the abolition of the old laws protecting the lacquer tree, and which in ancient times required each family, according to rank, to rear a certain number of trees. Those belonging to the upper classes were bound to cultivate 100 trees, the middle classes seventy, and the lower classes forty trees.

Encouragement.

Encouragement is something that we naturally look for.

A little praise, or word of hope, or a cheerful smile—something for the hungry soul to grasp and the weary mind to rest upon, as we climb the toilsome mountain of life.

How many poor hearts have sunk into despondency, when a little encouragement would have rescued them! How many have taken their lives in the hour of despair, when a friendly hand stretched out with aid might have saved them!

The child looks to the mother for help and encouragement, when it is taking its first step in walking. The school-boy looks for encouragement from his teacher, when he is taking his first step in education.

And so on through life. The soldier looks for it on the field of battle; it is the cheering voice of his leader that urges him on through the dangers of death and crowns the day with victory.

The poet and the artist look to the world to acknowledge their genius and give them praise. It is encouragement which calls forth their noblest words and helps them to climb the temple of fame until they surmount all difficulties and write their names in flaming letters upon its summit.

Then let us give encouragement to each other in every effort of good. In every noble action; in the little duties of life—and we will be happier for it; the world will be better; and a smiling Providence will look down and bless our labor of love.—Mehalah E. Tyson, in St. Louis Magazine.

Water as a Fat Producer.

A discovery of vital interest in social science is alleged to have been made in the recent assertion of some anonymous scientific sage that it is not food but water which makes us fat. If this is true it would seem to throw a new light on a large number of disputed questions. If adipose tissue is a desirable thing, then the work of the prohibitionists should be supported with unanimous approval, that we may become a sleek and well-contented nation.

There is, however, room for dispute as to whether more fat should be encouraged. Cæsar is represented by Shakspeare as wanting none but fat men about him. But there is every reason for belief that the great Roman preferred fat men because they would take things easily and would not disturb his rule by any restless attempts at liberty. This would indicate that lean men will be better for the leadership of a free people. There is room for suspicion that the professional politicians have had a secret knowledge of this discovery for many years, and in order to keep themselves in condition for the defense of freedom have guarded against the accumulation of fat by drinking no water at all, and keeping strictly to whisky.

FAREWELL TO AN OLD FRIEND.

Good-by, old hat, dear old silk hat,
Maybe old uncle-to-day;
But one I put you on the shelf
I have a word to say:
In weeks and months that now are past,
I've seen best on high,
I've followed with hesitant step—
Good-by, old hat, good-by.

Good-by, old hat, poor aged thing,
Now mated with stale and stale;
You've seen of multitudes of sins
Not one of your own, I wail.
But you will keep my secrets safe,
As none with you have lie;
Alone upon the chiffonier's shelf—
Good-by, old hat, good-by.

Good-by, old hat, some varied scenes
Have we shared together, too;
Where you came corner times, have we,
And pleasant moments, too—
And where you'd dine—why you set and pain,
When work's a-of madness to;
I'd take a wish with you, old hat—
Good-by, old friend, good-by.

Good-by, old hat, in this retrospect
Upon a time—worn life
Do many way-ores most absurd,
And not with half my strife.
But when I think of be gone days,
Of days that are to be,
I bid farewell to you, old hat—
Good-by, dear friend, good-by.

SAVED AS BY FATE.

BY SARA D. ROSE.

"What can it be, Louise, that is so charming about Alice? Any one but her would be pronounced homely, with those features; besides, she is a 'strawberry blonde,' she is freckled, and she has the most immense feet—wears a six, at the very least."

"I am sure I cannot say, but fascinating she certainly is; it must be in her manner or in her accomplishments. Who would ever have thought when she came here six months ago that she would be the belle of Lancaster?"

"I didn't, I'm sure, or I never would have allowed papa to offer her a home with us; just listen to that voice."

And Jeanette Taylor paused as the sweet tones of her cousin's voice came floating up to them from the music-room.

"She is practicing up for the concert. I'd give the world to keep her away from there. Claude Moltrop is sure to fall deader in love with her than ever, for she does look stunning in her concert dress, in spite of her red hair."

"Do you think that would make any difference, Jeanie? Would he follow her just the same if she did not attend the concert?"

"Hardly, for, you see, Claude knows nothing of this sudden summons Alice has received from Lady George, and if he should not meet her tonight, I feel sure I could secure him before Alice would ever see him again, for you know she goes in the early train."

"I rather think so myself," mused Louise Lorton. Jeanne Taylor's married sister. "He seems to be almost as attentive to you as he is to Alice; it may be only her singing which attracts him. What are you going to wear tonight, Jeanie?"

"My white tissue, but I know it's all vain to think anything about it, if she sings at that concert. I wish I dare send her away this minute," and Jeanne Taylor looked at her sister with despair and anger in her black eyes.

"It was a mistake, father's bringing her here," said Mrs. Lorton. "But you must do nothing rash, Jeanne; perhaps I may find a way to prevent her attending the concert.

"Oh, Louise, how? I have positively begged her not to go, have even hinted that it was unladylike to sing in public, but she is not to be turned from her course a single iota.

Mrs. Lorton smiled, and, bending over, whispered in her sister's ear a few words which acted like magic upon the despairing look in Jeanne's face.

"Oh, Louise, if you only could," she said.

"I think I can," replied Mrs. Lorton. "And now go down stairs and offer to help Alice with her packing, and then when you are both dressed come to me in the dining-room where, I will have a glass of lemonade prepared for you."

Jeanne departed with a little in amazed laugh, and Mrs. Lorton rung up her serving with a self-satisfied look.

After Taylor was an orphan. Her parents had left her a small fortune, and when her uncle Harvey had offered her a home with his own daughters she had accepted, not because she could not support herself, but for the companionship she had hoped to find with her cousins, who were about her own age. She had missed something in their demeanor from the first, but they had never been particularly unkind. Still the lonely girl missed the love she had craved with such intensiveness. Soon after her arrival, her cousin Louise had married, and was soon her latter's housekeeper, and acted as chaperon for Jeanne and Alice on all society occasions.

After she had been in society a few times people had discovered that plain little Alice Taylor possessed a beautiful voice and an indescribable charm of manner, and she began to be courted and flattered until six months after her arrival she was the acknowledged belle of the small town.

Mrs. Judge, one of the leaders of society, had decided just as the door opens, to get up a charity concert for the benefit of the indigent of Lancaster, and Alice Taylor's voice was to be the particular attraction. Mrs. Moltrop was very popular, and her only son Claude was considered the best "catch" in town, and Jeanne Taylor, before Alice's arrival, had been reasonably sure that the prize was her own. But there was a change, yet she strove with all the tact which is given the young society lady to place herself first in his regards; but alas for her, Alice's company was preferred to her own. She was secretly very angry, and Alice perceived an unpleasant change in her, which she could account for on no other grounds than the true cause.

About this time she received a letter from another uncle of hers, who wished her to fill a daughter's place to him. She hailed the change with joy, and had planned to start for his distant home the morning after the concert.

All this had been kept perfectly quiet by her cousins, for they feared she would receive an offer of marriage from Claude Moltrop before her departure. Alice knew this, but she expected to meet Claude once more before leaving, and her gentle heart fluttered at what might happen on that portentous evening.

She was, therefore, a little surprised at Jeanne's kindness that afternoon when she came down and offered so pleasantly to help her about her packing.

"I am sorry you are to leave us, Alice," she said; "although I don't doubt you will like it at Uncle George's."

"I hope so," said Alice, brightly; "and I ever shall forget your kindness in giving me a home when I had none, Jeanne."

"That was nothing," said Jeanne. "How time does fly; we ought to be dressing now, and Louise has set out a lunch for us before we go."

Alice did not know what to make of this unusual kindness, and went away to her dressing room thinking that she would have a freshen up alone with her cousins after all, and they were sorry she was leaving them.

Dress made a great change in the plain little girl's looks, and it was an airy, graceful figure that accompanied Jeanne to the dining room where Louise, also attired for the concert, was awaiting them.

"We will have to go along girls. Papa and Sir Lorton will drop in before the concert is over," she said, and then she observed, "I have some splendid lemonade here, as cold as ice can make it. I thought you would like some, it is such a warm evening."

"Thank you," said Alice, "I do not care for anything to eat, but I will take a glass of lemonade."

"I know your taste, you see, my dear cousin," said Louise lightly, handing each of the girls a heavy goblet which stood ready filled at her elbow.

"How do you like it?" she asked, when Alice had half emptied her glass.

"It is excellent," was her smiling reply.

"We must get on our wraps," said Jeanne hurriedly, setting down her glass. "It is getting late; drink up your lemonade, Al. I hear the carriage."

Alice drained the last drop of the delicious draught and followed her cousin into the cutting room where her wraps were lying.

"Sit down in this chair, Al, and let me arrange those lilies of the valley in your hair," said Louise. "That could not have been our carriage, Jeanne."

"Alice and Jeanne, and that was the last she remembered distinctly, for she fell into a deep sleep and soon after the two sisters laid her limp form upon a couch in the corner of the room.

"You are sure it will not hurt her, Louise?" asked Jeanne, a little regretfully.

"Of course not," was the reply. "I've taken it for a nowadays a great many times; she will have a dreamless night's sleep—that is all."

"But, Louise, how? I have positively begged her not to go, have even hinted that it was unladylike to sing in public, but she is not to be turned from her course a single iota.

Mrs. Lorton smiled, and, bending over, whispered in her sister's ear a few words which acted like magic upon the despairing look in Jeanne's face.

"Then she will start for Uncle George's in the morning train, and you, if you play your cards right, will marry Claude Moltrop."

Louise smiled, and, bending over her white-robed cousin, overlooked her toilet, and then followed her sister to the dining room and was driven to the large hall where the concert was to be given.

The two ladies rushed to their seats, and it was not long before Claude Moltrop joined them.

"Did you see Alice come with you?" were almost the first words he said.

"No," replied Mrs. Lorton. "She starts for the East in the early train, and so gave up attending."

"But she will be with us before leaving?" My sister will be at a complete loss."

"That's just the way with Al," replied Jeanne. "No one can depend upon her in the least if she gets a little whim of anything; she always acts so."

Mr. Moltrop said but little more in the two ladies, and then made his way back through the hall, which was crowded, to the green-room.

"Mary," said he, "Miss Taylor is not going to come. What will you do?"

"Not going to come?" echoed Mrs. Moltrop, in excited surprise. "She must come; we would look fooly any event at all without her. What is the matter? Is she ill?"

"I believe not. Mrs. Lorton, or rather Jeanne Taylor, gave me to understand she was miffed at something.

"Impossible," said Mrs. Moltrop. "Claude, you get the carriage and swift go after her. I would be disappointed this great audience for anything. If Alice Taylor is in town she must sing."

Mary Moltrop, a close friend of hers, when the fire-bell began to ring excitedly, but the street aliles rushed toward the indicated locality.

"That's somewhere near the music hall," said one to the other as they hurried to the bells.

"Dark fire," said Mrs. Moltrop, "What if it should have caught fire? It was fearfully warm."

"Let's go back," said Claude.

Their forebodings were too true, when they arrived frantic mass of people were pouring from the building, and the engines were pouring a steady stream of Water, upon the raging flames.

It was not long before the fire was subdued, but the scene was a heart-rending one when the mass of burned and crushed humanity was taken from the crowded building. Many lives had been lost in the swaying living mass who had wildly attempted to escape, and many had been more or less bruised by the hungry flames.

Claude McTrop assisted Edgar Lorton, as he brought out his dead wife, all crushed and burned to death. Mrs. Taylor was found with her beautiful face and hands deeply burned by the falling embers. It was the saddest occurrence which had ever happened in this town. The sufferers never forgot that scene to their dying day.

Poor Jeanne Taylor was scarred deeply for life, and when at last her cousin and Claude Moltrop were engaged, Jeanne would not let Alice leave, she told them the whole story of the evening of the concert.

Alice freely forgave her, as she looked at her scarred face, and thought that she herself had been saved as by fate.

The Kind of Oil.

For a moment let us glance at the principal sources of animal and vegetable oil supply, ere the fountains of mineral oil were revealed for the use and comfort of the human family.

First and foremost, of course, ranked the fish oils—the well-known train oil drawn out which drained from the blubber of the great Greenland whale—a large whale sometimes yielding thirty tons of blubber—each ton representing nearly 200 gallons of oil. Though the cachalot, or sperm whale, could never rival the Greenland whale in the quantity of blubber, it could lay at least the advantage of quality and variety, since, besides ordinary blubber, it yields a large amount of sperm-oil, and also of spermaceti. Of the latter valuable product, the head alone often yields ten barrels.

Next among oil-yielding fish come the grampus, or dolphin, the porpoise, the shark, the seal, the cod, the herring, and others.

Of animal fats are butter, tallow, lard, goose-grease, neat's-foot oil (prepared from the feet of oxen and used by curriers in dressing leather, and man's grease (imported from Buenos Ayres and Montevideo, where a multitude of horses are annually slaughtered for the sake of their hides, tallow, and bones). In Russia, especially at Moscow, yelk-of-egg oil is in great repute for making soap and pomatum.

Vegetable oils form a very important item in our supplies, inasmuch as oil-seeds to the value of £5,500,000 are annually imported into Britain for crushing purposes, and our exports of oil are roughly valued at £1,000,000. The export of seed-oil from London, Hull, and Liverpool, in 1881, was 14,395,893 gallons.

Under the head of seed-oils rank linseed, cottonseed, and castor oil. Colza oil, also, is made from mustard, lesser radish, rape, turnip, and other seeds. Olive is produced and almond oil. From India comes poppy-seed oil, the Black Sea, oil of sunflower seeds, from Ceylon and the Pacific Isles comes cocoanut oil. From Western Africa the palm-nut oil of the seed; in Italy, oil of grape stones; in China, oil of tea seed; in India, oil of mimosa, of the poppy, of the gandhi, of the apple seed, of cashew-nut, of cardamom, of sesame, of coriander, and many others. Brand, too, has a large number of oils, both animal and vegetable, peculiar to itself.—Popular Science Monthly.

A Delicate Question.

One afternoon, as the Hon. W. C. Bunkum, a lawyer and M.P. for Western New York, was traveling over the Central, he was approached by the conductor, who was one of his innumerable friends, and who announced that he wanted his advice on a matter delicate matter.

"Well, what is it?" said the lawyer.

"Well, Mr. Raines, the fact is, there's a big two-tisted fellow forward in the smoker that won't quit his fare."

"Well?"

"Well, what I want to ask you is: Had I better let him ride free or take a licking?"—Drake's Magazine.

LIFE IN A MONASTERY.

A Monotonous Existence—The Daily Routine.

A monk's day begins at 4:30 a. m., and as breakfast is a very light and hasty matter, taken without formality somewhere between 8 and 5, no one will be surprised to hear that English stomachs are ready for their principal meal at 12:30. Let us go through a day: At 4:55 precisely—for punctuality is a great matter—the big bell begins tolling for matinns. This is the modern equivalent of what used to be called the midnight office. In the thirteenth century the time was 2 a. m., now it is 5; in some monasteries on the continent it is 4. But in these days they went to bed at sundown or after, if they were moderns think it o'clock early. When the tower clock has ceased striking 5, all rise at a signal given by the superior, from the place where they have been kneeling and waiting in the chancel and the matins service begins. On ordinary days it lasts an hour and a quarter, and has not much about it of ceremony or ritual that could catch the eye of an onlooker. Let us on festivals it is an altogether gay scene, and must begin earlier on account of its great prolixity. On such occasions a large number are arrayed in cope and alb; the organ accompanies the chant, and sometimes the voices of boys mingle with the heavier tones of full men. The little choristers are selected from the abbey school. "Prime" is chanted at 7:30; the conventual mass that is the public mass of the day is sung at 9 o'clock, and all the monks in a whole school assists. On festivals this is the great celebration of the day, and is more or less solemn in proportion to the greatness of the feast; a sermon then accompanies it. The next time that the community are called to the church is for the office of "none," and after this, at 4, comes the evening office or vespers. This, like the mass, is sung with organ accompaniment, and these two, with matins, make up the more solemn of the daily services, at which all are most stringently bound to be present. The office of "compline" the closing prayer of the day, recited at 8:30, makes the sixth and last time that the monks assemble in the church. They spend about three hours and a half every day in this choral duty—on festivals much more; it is one of the principal employments of monastic life. The order of the day is varied only on Thursdays, when the afternoon is devoted to foot bathing, and on Sundays and very great festivals when the afternoon service takes place at 10 o'clock, for the convenience of those outsiders who frequent the abbey church and attend the 9 o'clock mass. The remainder of the day is filled up in diverse ways, in the discharge of the various occupations which each has assigned to him. From the end of compline till the end of prime at the following morning is a time of the strictest silence and reflection; not a word is spoken, not a sound made except of the gravest necessity, and no work or business is done. It is the time for the slightly by rest, and for meditation and private prayer. But when prime is ended, the active work of the day begins. Foremost among this is the work of teaching; for the monks of these orders still maintain their ancient tradition of education, and the school is an almost integral part of a monastic establishment.

A Relic of "Harry of the West."

Mrs. Col. Alexander, residing near the city, on the Westbrook road, is the owner of a very magnificent trunk, which possesses an additional value as a relic. It belonged to Harry Lee, and lently contested race for the Presidency in 1844, between Henry Clay, of Kentucky, and James B. Polk, of Tennessee, a number of ardent admirers of Mr. Clay, being thoroughly convinced in their own minds that he would win the election and be inaugurated President of the United States, ordered for him the finest leather trunk that could be made. It was manufactured in the city of Cincinnati, and is a marvel of elegance and durability, being exquisitely designed to convey the clothes of Mr. Clay, as President, to Washington City. It is a splendid piece of handiwork, and contains a remarkably correct likeness of the grand old Kentucky "Commoner," wrought in hand in the leather. But, alas! the book had place of nice and neat, gone off agley. The election came on. The vote was very close. As in the hard contested New York was then the battleground, New York gave Mr. Polk a majority of about 5,000, insuring for him her electoral vote and his election. The Whigs of the Union, in view of the closeness of the contest, had determined to prevent the trunk to Mr. Clay, but to take it to Col. Alexander was deemed too risky a chance, and given the prize.—Louisville Courier-Journal.

Feminine "Sensitiveness."

A woman is far more sensitive than a man. She has finer feelings and a more delicate mind. There are very few who realize this, and in consequence woman is made to endure small unnecessary suffering. One of our merchants was going to church with his wife on Sunday, when she said she suddenly stopped and put her hand to her head.

"What's the matter?" he asked, startled by the look on her face.

"Oh! I have got on my brown hat!"

"Eh?" ejaculated the astonished man. She burst into tears.

"Why, Martha, what is the matter with you?" he demanded.

"Don't you see what is the matter?" she returned, in a sobbing voice. "I've got on my brown hat with my striped silk. Oh, what will people say?"—Danbury News.

CLEVELAND'S CABINET.

Probable Effects of the Change on Office-Holders—Views of an Old-Timer.

(Correspondence Rochester Sunday Herald.)

—Yes, the principal topic of conversation here at present is the probable action of the incoming administration.

The speaker was Mr. William M. Ashley, of 501 Maine avenue, a man whose large and intimate acquaintance with prominent people in the Capital of the nation renders his opinion of weight.

Among all important questions among the chiefs of the various departments is, Who is to go? In my opinion there will be very few changes among the office-holders who have been here now for a year and you through several administrations. The reason is will occur among the heads of departments."

"The sense of security which must necessarily pervade the departments is, I suppose, pleasantly to the proper transaction of business?"

"Well, rather, I reckon. It puts the clerks for business. Some get very blue, for they have purchased little houses which they must sacrifice.

"Did not rumor it was reported that many were of majority. How is it?"

"More likely 10 of a four of clubs, I don't think Washington is very unfortunate. At the same time I admit that since residing here I have not always felt secure. At times I have been greatly troubled with sharpshooting fears. One day my right arm and leg would torture me with pain, then would be great excitement in the office of the porch, and perhaps the next day the girls are so much more cheerfully affected. Then again it would seem to some particular mark, and I would be troubled with a feeling that I would be shot in the fourth, Then would be weeks at a time, and I would be affected with a feeling that I would be shot that would come on every afternoon and may me uncomfortable. I felt so on the morning of the inauguration of the twenty-four hours."

"Of course you have the Civil Service regarding your difficulty?"

"Absolutely I have. Well, I should say I did. Some told me I had seemingly; others that I had differentiated my classification, for which I have was no cause."

"But what I have try to relieve your misery?"

"Yes, they vomited and physicked me, blistered and bled me, plastered and oiled me, sweat, steamed and shower-bathed me to no use. I was a wreck."

"But how did you finally recover?"

"I took a friend of mine, who also had been afflicted in a similar way, and bled him good. He wrote me regarding his recovery and advised me to try the remedy which upon him, I prepared a bottle and commenced its use, taking a tablespoonful after each meal and at bed time. I had used it about a week when I noticed a decrease of the pressure of the fullness of my stomach feeling of relief. I persevered in its use and finally my bowels moved around without the aid of a cathartic. I had my friends that it was a very good medicine. Some time that had passed away."

"And do you regard your cure as permanent?"

"Its was more than a year ago, the cure was effectuated, and I haven't been so well in years as I am now."

"Speaking of Cleveland's cabinet, who is your opinion, will comprise his cabinet?"

"That is so difficult to determine—as it is to say how the Republicans will act. Some good men have been named for the positions—Bayard, Thurman, Hendricks, Bissell, Morrison and Lamont. Bayard is a Democrat, Bissell is a Republican, Morrison has a slate made up, Lamont is a Democrat, Hendricks is a Democrat, as is also the Vice-President, Thurman is a Democrat

Just One Way to Do.

Joseph Howard, Jr., a newspaper correspondent of National reputation, writes to the Boston Herald concerning great men who have been ruined through drink. Mr. Howard is known to his friends as a convival man, fond of a glass of liquor, yet he says:

"There is just one way to do, and that is, to literally and absolutely avoid tasting spirits at all. I am no believer in moderate drinking, but, while I would be the last to suggest any arbitrary dealing with my fellowmen, I believe the best thing that could possibly be given to the generation following fast upon our heels would be a conscience so alert that the faintest leaning toward indulgence in this most pernicious of habits, would seem like flying in the face of Providence and a desecration of the noblest sentiment known to man. I was in the great bar room of a magnificent hotel last night, talking with a number of friends, all of whom were indulging from time to time in summer drinks. Two boys, one I should judge fifteen and the other seventeen, attired in the fullest fashion, entered, smoking, and without the faintest suspicion that they were doing anything to attract attention, much less to excite a smile, leaned upon the bar. 'What will you take, Charley?' said one. 'Oh I don't know, I think a whiskey smash is good enough for me. What will you have?' 'Well that suits me.' The clerk mixed two whisky smashes the boys raised the glasses and drained the cups, paid the check and walked out. That incident was a text upon which nearly every man in the room, and there were from twenty to thirty of them, delivered a little sermon, the burden of all of which was: 'How absurd, how ridiculous; what a pity, what a shame; and yet those boys saw their father, his friends, and a serie of well-dressed, well-behaved gentlemen doing precisely the same thing—so why shouldn't they do it."

She Rode the Pony.

Deacon Bodkin's daughters, Samantha and Martha, have for a long time watched with longing eyes the young ladies who frequently pass and repass, sound in the beautiful and fashionable dog-carts.

"They are just too lovely for anything," said Samantha. "We might toss pa to buy us a pony and a cart."

"Indeed we must," assented Martha.

"What on airth do you gals want of one of them newfangled critter things?" inquired the Deacon. The pesky thing'll run away with ye, likely's not."

"Oh! no, pa, we can drive him. Now, please do say yes," cried both maidens in unison, till importunity won.

"Wall, wall," said the Deacon, "if you two gals will just stop talkin' long enough for me to take a nap I'll think about it."

A few days thereafter a beautiful little white pony made its appearance in the stable.

"Now, gals," said the Deacon, "I've got the hoss, but you'll have to wait a day or two for the cart. Don't go to bein' onease now. He'll keep, I'll warrant ye."

The Deacon had scarcely left the house before the two young women led the pony out into the back yard and were admiring his beauty.

"I do really believe I could ride him," said Samantha. "I mean to try it, anyway."

"You haven't any saddle, or habit, either. Suppose somebody should see you," warned Martha.

"Who is there to see but you?" asked Samantha, as she led the pony up to the door-step, and, grasping the mane, mounted "man-fashion."

The pony spring forward and danced around the yard as in a ring, at the top of his speed. Samantha screamed and clasped her arms about the neck of the animal, and used all her powers of persuasion to induce him to cease his performance. But all to no purpose. Round and round he went, till suddenly he turned with a whirl and plunged toward the gate. Shrieks of horror burst from the two girls as the pony yielded and the pony, with Samantha, now in a state of marvelous inhability, clinging to his back, rushed out and tore down the street at the top of his speed. Shriek after shriek rent the air and the deacon, who was quietly wending his way to his office, gloating about, saw the flying steed and its rider.

"Mercy's sake," he said, "I'd orter told the gals I bought that pony from the circus man."

When Samantha and the pony burst into the circumstant and made a circuit of the ring the effect was certainly thrilling and fall worth the price of admission.—Boston Globe.

Gathered From Garbage.

A machine has been put to use in New York to sift from house refuse and street sweepings all rags, old iron, broken glass, etc. The machine is described as being a vast rag and bone-picker of many Italian power, working by steam. Its daily capacity is 150 loads of 1,850 pounds each. The oscillator moves to and fro 250 times a minute, while two or three Italians stand alongside and pick all rags and scraps of paper out of the mass. What is then left, after the dust has fallen below, is passed into a washer, in which all straw, leather, vegetable refuse and other light material rises to the surface of the water, and is burned. The coal, iron, glass, and other heavy objects fall to the bottom of the water, are washed in another vat of water and are sold. Out of 150 loads of refuse but thirty are conveyed away as waste. The rags bring about $20 per ton, the old iron forty cents a hundred pounds, the glass thirty cents a hundred, the bones are the most valuable, and about 400 pounds of coal and cinder are obtained from a load of 1,850 pounds.—Paper World.

A SUBMARINE HOTEL.

A Seaside Boarder who Lives on Sea-Cucumbers.

Several years ago in walking along the half submerged fringing reef of the Tortugas group of islands, my attention was attracted by numbers of great, black, worm-like creatures that were strewn over the bottom just within the breakers, where the water was smooth. They were Holothurians, or sea-cucumbers. Wishing to secure a large specimen, I hauled my boat over among them, and soon had one more than a foot in length in the glass jar, or portable aquarium, carried for that purpose.

Another was lifted from its sandy bed for examination, and a curious creature it was. It seemed like a great, grotesque caterpillar, made out of leather and stuffed with water, as the handling caused it to eject two streams of water with considerable force. After placing it upon the seat of the boat, we found that the creature had ejected all its interior organs—actually thrown them off. This would have been a grievous calamity to almost any animal except the sea-cucumber; but, curiously enough, they have the faculty of producing lost parts to a wonderful degree, and if placed back in the water would soon provide themselves with an entirely new set.

If we should follow up our investigations of the anatomy of the sea-cucumber we should find that it breathes by what is called a water-vascular system. In the star-fish a hard red spot is seen upon the upper surface, punctured with minute holes. Through this water is strained and taken in, passing out into the arms and filling the sac-like feet. In the sea-cucumber there is a similar arrangement, only the madreporic plate, as the pink sieve is called, is on the inside.

Though certainly not gourmands, starvation affects them in a remarkable way. Thus, if kept a long time without food, a ring will be formed about the tail that grows deeper and deeper, until finally the piece drops off. In a short time another ring appears and another piece is sacrificed—a most remarkable operation, you will say, but quite ingenious when we understand it.

The animal is merely retrenching, and, as the food supply becomes smaller and smaller, portions of the body are thrown off, so that there will not be so much to feed, until, at last, the sea-cucumber will sacrifice its entire body to save the mouth or head, and finally this dies, certainly after a heroic struggle.

But, while we have been looking at other sea-cucumbers, what has happened to the one we placed in the glass jar? Being a large animal, it soon exhausted the air in the water, and is now endeavoring to get out, twisting its body deliberately about to show its discomfort, for you must remember that the sea-cucumber and all other water animals require air just as much as ourselves.

For a few moments the sea-cucumber writhed about in its lazy fashion, when, all at once, out of one end I saw peeping a curious, delicate head.

A moment later it was still farther out—a transparent, shining fish, and soon, with a convulsive wiggle, it freed itself from its strange prison and swam about a moment; then it settled to the bottom.

Its body was so delicate and transparent that print could almost be read through it, and a specimen that I have before me now, though shrunk and hardened in alcohol for several years, is still almost like glass.

How did the fish get into the sea-cucumber? you will ask. This was, at first, a puzzle, and to ascertain whether it was accidental or not, we collected a large number of the cucumbers, (Holothuria floridiana), and in nearly every case, as soon as the animal had exhausted the air in our aquarium, the silvery, eel-like Fierasfer—for this is the fish's name—would come wiggling out, swim about a moment, as if dazed and bewildered, and then sink to the bottom and die.

It was evident that the fish was not eaten by the Holothurian, and equally plain that the fish was not adapted for the outside world. Hence, we assumed that the Fierasfer was a boarder in the cucumber, and such is really the case.

But, though I made many experiments, the fish could never be induced to return to its home, though freshly aerated water was constantly supplied.

The explanation that seemed the most tenable was that the fish never left the holothurian; but this was highly improbable, and so the puzzle remained until it was solved by the curator of the great aquarium at Naples, Italy.

He found that his sea-cucumbers were also inhabited by a Fierasfer, and by carefully watching them he saw the fishes come out and return.

In the large tank the fishes ventured out, swam around, probably fed, and finally returned; and here is the most remarkable thing about it. Instead of returning head first, as you would naturally expect, the Fierasfer slipped, not its head, but the tip of its tail into the orifice.

In a moment, the sea-cucumber relaxed its draw in water, and the cucumber, and another inch gained, and so on until, to the amazement of the Italian naturalist, the Fierasfer disappeared, tail first, within the very accommodating animal.

The Fierasfer, then, is a boarder in the sea-cucumber, a tenant that not only lives upon its host without pay, but does not hesitate to attack it when hungry. This has been proved by Prof. Semper, who found pieces of the water-lung of the living hotel in the stomach of the boarder; but, as we have seen, the former has the power of reproducing lost parts, and probably does not suffer. The boarder indiscriminately feeds upon the food taken by its host.—Prof Holden in Golden Days.

Charles Sumner's Widow.

A rumor that the well-known American banker in London, Mr. Junius S. Morgan, is to marry the divorced wife of Charles Sumner has obtained a limited circulation. It has been published in a New Orleans paper as a fact already announced by authority in London. It will very naturally create some surprise, for Mr. Morgan is about 70 years old, and was supposed to have passed the marriage point. His first wife died six or seven years ago. She was a daughter of John Pierpont, the American poet, who died at Medford, Mass., in 1866. He was at the time holding an office in the Treasury Department at Washington, which had been given him in recognition of his services as chaplain in a Massachusetts regiment during the war. Mrs. Morgan was a lady of great culture and was for nearly half a century a worthy companion of her distinguished husband. They had two or three children, the best known of whom is Mr. John Pierpont Morgan, of the New York banking firm of Drexel, Morgan & Co. J. S. Morgan went over to London in 1857 or thereabouts with George Peabody, who that year came over to America and established the Peabody Institute at his old home, Danvers, Mass. Mr. Morgan had already made a fortune. He began life as a clerk in a cotton goods establishment at Hartford, Conn., and after prospering till he became a partner in the house sold out and went to Boston, where he became associated with one of the largest importing concerns there. It was thus that he got his London acquaintance and that he attracted the admiration and friendship of Mr. Peabody. When he went over to London he became associated with Mr. Peabody in the banking business. He was the "Co." of George Peabody & Co., and immediately became a great favorite with the first people of London and American visitors. He is a gentleman of splendid appearance, the most refined tastes and agreeable manner. The banking house of J. S. Morgan & Co. is known all over the world, and through it most Americans transact their London business. Mr. Morgan is worth at least $25,000,000, and has a country house near London that is noted for its Elizabethan architecture and beautiful surroundings. The lady to whom they say he is to be married wears the name of Mrs. Alice Mason. She discarded the Sumner name when she got the divorce from the celebrated Massachusetts statesman. She was a widow when he married her, and her first husband's name was Mason. The latter name she chose to keep. There has always been a mystery about her separation from Sumner. They were married soon after the war, in 1866, I believe, and the next year she got her divorce. They lived together but a few months, when she left him in disgust. Sumner was then an old man and had always lived a bachelor, and he did not long survive his unfortunate matrimonial venture. Mrs. Mason is not yet an old woman, having been quite young and very attractive in personal appearance when she was married to Sumner. She has an ample fortune in her own right.—New York World.

A Sad Disappointment.

At Sacramento, the other day, a man was on his last legs with pneumonia. His life was insured for several thousand dollars, and it appeared to him a little tough that he was to get no fun out of all this money. Determined to do the best he could under the circumstances, he made a will that he thought would cover a portion of the ground. His will provided that at his funeral every hack in town should be employed, and all of his friends and acquaintances invited to attend and take a ride afterward. All who attended were also invited to participate in a grand banquet in the evening at the hotel, at which a brass band, which should lead the funeral procession, was to relieve the occasion with music. After making his will he was so tickled with the idea of the whole affair, as he could see it in his mind's eye, and with a thought of what a large slice of the insurance he was thus having the fun of spending, that he at once began to mend, and in spite of himself got well. Now he is as far as ever from the insurance money, and mourns the loss of the grand banquet, the brass band and the other big things that were to make his funeral a notable event.—Territorial Enterprise.

WASHINGTON.

It is said that the House Appropriations Committee will discount the naval bill just passed by the Senate and will frame a regular bill for the next fiscal year. If the Senate does not accept this, an extra session of Congress will be unavoidable.

The expense of the protracted Swain court-martial in Washington is reaching a very large figure.

Lieut. Gen. Sheridan is confined to his house by illness, which, though serious, is said not to be dangerous. He is suffering from disorganization of the stomach, and has physicians constantly in attendance at home and abroad.

Secretary Frelinghuysen has sent to the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations a letter stating that the negotiation of the reciprocity arrangements with Mexico are with a policy which had received Congress sanction, and that the contract that there is no thought of the annexation of Cuba, but that Congress will give us all the benefits of such absorption. He then proceeds to meet the objections of the Spanish and tobacco interests.

There is an impression that the Spanish treaty may be withdrawn, and one more favorable to Spain substituted.

The aggregate internal revenue receipts for January are over $7,000,000 less than for the corresponding month of last year.

Secretary Chandler is said to have informed Congressman Randall that the appropriations complained of by the Senate would not be grossly inadequate and would be supplemented by deficiencies. Randall and the House will regard the Secretary's advice, as he is a good census for refusing to pass the bill.

Secretary McCulloch has obtained from the Attorney General and the Solicitor General opinions that on the filing of an application for a patent there is no reason why the patent should not be promulgated to exempt to Government employees for a reasonable period after the expiration of three years, when it will affect, if perhaps not benefit, the taxes on 27,000,000 gal one of whisky.

Formal charges against Assistant Adjutant General McKeever have been submitted to the Secretary of War by Chief Signal Officer Hazen, on account of criticisms said to have been made by Gen. McKeever upon the management of the Greely expedition.

Reports made to the Bureau of Agriculture at Washington place the total cotton production of the United States for the year at 5,500,000 bales.

The feeling of antagonism between the two houses of Congress is growing more and more bitter. Representatives unite in condemning the efforts of the Senate to usurp the prerogatives of the House, and Senators are scarcely more in sympathy with what they consider their rights. The discussion over the naval and indemnity commerce bills has increased the feeling.

POLITICAL.

In the Toledo Congressional District Democrats have decided to connect the election of James Romes.

A move is on foot in Washington looking to inducing President Cleveland some one of his appointments between the Senate and Representatives-elect, in giving them the selection in the several States and districts. It is not thought, however, that the President will delegate any such power to any such source.

A convention of Prohibitionists of Illinois met at Decatur, Ill. S. Kepley being elected Chairman. Gov. St. John, of Kansas, spoke for two hours. Committees were appointed to prepare an address to the people, and to formulate a plan for better organization in the State.

Democrats who have lately visited Gen. Cleveland agree in confessing that they could elicit no information from him concerning his purposes, and express a doubt as to whether he has chosen a single member of his Cabinet as yet. They pronounce him a good listener, but cautious in making promises.

The National Civil-Service Reform League recently wrote to Gen. Cleveland commending its purpose to his patriotic care. The President-elect replied that he remained himself as pledged to practical reform, but that he feared doubtful whether friends of the same would stand firmly by it when it confronted him in a personal form. He still of situation to the fear that many office-holders have disregarded their duty to the people and become active partisans, and should be taught a lesson.

In the construction which they place upon Gen. Cleveland's letter on Civil Service Reform Association, says the Washington correspondent of the Chicago Times, Democrats and Republicans are about equally divided, and they are pleased or dissatisfied according. The general tone of the presentation is commended by a large portion of both parties, but many officeholders and the Democratic spoilsmen are puzzled to measure the length and breadth of Cleveland's meaning. In the paragraph which declares that there are many persons holding office who have forfeited all just claim to retention because they have used their power for party purposes, and proved themselves offensive partisans and unscrupulous manipulators of local party management. It is claimed that this paragraph opens a wide door through which may drive out nineteenths of the employes of the Government, and that he would not have been so careful to insert it, unless he had his purpose to take advantage of that easy method of displacing Republicans to make room for Democrats. Another class of Democrats appreciate of the theory of the letter that merit rather than mere party service should be the test of fitness for office, but they question the judgment of Cleveland in committing himself on the subject of civil service reform in anticipation of his inaugural deliverance upon public occasions, and without sufficient reason for discussing the subject at this time.

MISCELLANEOUS.

There were 278 failures in the United States reported to Bradstreet's during the week, against 265 in the preceding week and 303, 292, and 261 in the corresponding weeks of 1883, 1882, and 1881, respectively. CIVIL SERVICE.

Correspondence Between Gov. Cleveland and G. W. Curtis on the Subject.

The President-Elect Regards Himself as Pledged to Civil Service Reform.

The following correspondence, which has been made public at New York, explains itself:

NATIONAL CIVIL-SERVICE REFORM LEAGUE,
Office of the Secretary,
New York, Dec. 7, 1884.

Hon. Grover Cleveland:

SIR—We have the honor, in address in behalf of the National Civil Service Reform Association, to inquire the intention of the Executive in the same, and which, we have reason to believe, is entertained by a large number of persons engaged in the service of the Government, and others who have expressed interest in the work of the League, in the direction of a modification of the national administration, as we are informed, has been supposed to be implied that the Chief Executive stands by the letter of the pledge of the Chicago platform in the practice of the reform and the extension of the principle of the reform in the classified service, and that the Democratic party is pledged in the traditions and usages of the party, there is nothing in the letter of the Chicago platform in the party character in the National Government, and that the Chief Executive is not pledged to the proposition that offices, as a rule, do not belong to the adherents of the party in power, and that the Chief Executive is not pledged to the proposition that the party which has passed the ordeal of such party changes, and has been in power for a decade, and has public expressions favorable to reform and to the Civil Service Reform Association, and has been in the minority, seems to be entitled to cause to your publicly avowed purpose, and to the principles which political parties have intimated you frequently voiced.

WILLIAM EVARTS, President.
GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS, Chairman.
W. W. Montgomery, Jacob D. Hall Thomas, Jr. Cornwell, Merrill Wyman, Rufus Schurz, Silas W. Burt, J. S. Sheffield, William Carey Sanger, William W. Aiken, Executive Committee.

ALBANY, Dec. 9, 1884.

HEAD MR. GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS, President, etc.

DEAR SIR—Your communication, dated the 8, addressed to me at New York, and signed by yourself and other officers of the League, reached me here yesterday. That practical reform in the civil service is demanded is abundantly established by the fact that the statute referred to is your enunciation of the principle that offices should be administered for the benefit of both political parties, and by the fact that the statute is generally praised among partisan papers calling for a fair and honest enforcement of the law which it contains. I have regarded myself pledged to this, because practically it is the only method in which I could carry out the purpose that this reform should be in good faith, and without reserve entered, and because in the many circumstances under prior to my election as President, avowed by the party in which I belong (in which I have no disposition to shelter, but which I have no purpose to desert) I should be false to the trust reposed in me if I should be false to the party in which I belong, and which I have no disposition to shelter, but which I have no purpose to desert, and because I have no reason to believe that my course in this direction will be misunderstood by the Executive may demonstrate that the stand which I have taken in the civil service are unexplained. I know they are appreciated by the party in power, and I have supposed to be in accordance with the views in the mediocrity of party considerations, and I am not without hope that in a time of reflection the Executive will stand firmly by the ground which I have taken, and which I have supposed to be in accordance with the views of

The Statesman says that the case of Coulson, Dyer & Phillips vs. A. J. Stroud, has been decided in favor of the latter, and as there was $300 pending, Mr. Stroud naturally feels good over it. The case was tried in Grand Rapids.

Northern Michigan towns which were visited last year by members of the Ohio wholesale and retail lumber dealers' association are hoping to have the visit repeated this winter. There's money in it in the long run for the towns.

Muskegon wants a free mail delivery, and in order to bring the receipts of the postoffice up to the necessary $10,000 a year, the Muskegonites propose to stop using the express company for small packages, and to send them by mail instead.

Sheriff Berdan's appointments so far are as follows: Under Sheriff, H. C. Cosper, Charlevoix; deputies, Ernst Shanklin, Charlevoix; H. A. Thompson, Boyne; Thos. Trimble, Ernst Joslyn; L. F. Duvell, Boyne Falls; Owen Miller, Bigelow.

"A yankee inventor at Charlevoix has applied for a patent for a computer for street and passenger cars. It has metallic bars on top and stationary and level with and part of the floor. It has a valve, and is released by running water through it."—Evening News.

W. C. Mears desires to organize a singing class, and to that end will meet at those interested at the opera house next Monday evening at 7 o'clock. The intention is to give a series of twelve lessons, followed by a concert, the drill of which will be of great value to those taking part.

At the last meeting of the council the village hall was accepted and paid for, and a resolution adopted offering the use of certain rooms to the county at an annual rental of one dollar per year or so long as the county was needing at Charlevoix. The board, however, refused to accept it. LATER—The board have accepted at a rent of two dollars.

W. S. Johnson intends to rebuild his boarding house as soon as possible, but not on the old site. His intention now is to build on his lot on Antrim street, and to make such a boarding house, but a farmers' hotel, where he can accommodate his many farmer friends and others who may come to town.

Mackinac's new hotel is to be shaped like the three sides of a square, the three shorter legs, and will accommodate 60 guests. It is to cost $60,000, and is to be open by July, 1885. Material is being put in shape at Harbor Springs, and will be shipped to the island early in the spring.

Services at the M. E. church next Sunday morning and evening. The Sunday school has been reorganized, with E. H. Green as Superintendent, with a full corps of officers and teachers. The school never never grew good for work than now, and a general revival is in extended to cooperate in reaching sinners.

President Hughart, of the Grand Rapids & Indiana Railroad, states that there is no foundation whatever for the statements published in some Detroit and Chicago papers to effect that the Company generally throughout Northern Michigan are in desperate circumstances. They were never better provided than at the present time.

The commissioner of navigation reports that Michigan tonnage amounts to 222,000, making her sixth in the list of states. The total tonnage of the northern lakes is 732,000, or greater than the entire tonnage of the western rivers and Pacific coast. The tonnage of vessels built in Michigan during the last fiscal year was nearly 17,000, exceeding that of any other state in the union except Maine and Pennsylvania.

The Flint Journal says: "It is worth remembering that no newspaper is practical especially for one person any more than a boot is built especially to please one person. People who become greatly displeased with something they find in a newspaper, should remember that the very thing that displeases them is exactly the thing that will please somebody who has just as much interest in the paper as they have."

I. A. DeLamarter, whose death was mentioned last week, leaves a wife, and one son about 10 years old. He had an insurance on his life of $2,000. Mr. DeLamarter was a hard worker for a livelihood, and was well liked by his employers and his associates. His funeral was held Sunday afternoon, and was well attended by representatives of the Engineer fraternity, and Dexter Lodge, of which organization he was a member.

The Detroit house of correction for nature factory, the state prison wagon factory and other concerns that employ convict labor to the detriment of free labor, are likely to have a lively tussle for existence at the coming session of the legislature. The Knights of Labor and other workingmen's organizations will make themselves heard in opposition to the continuance of the present convict labor system.—Grand Rapids Democrat.

The Charlotte Leader gives utterance to its experience with newspaper delinquents as follows: "The moment some one that's footsteed is the subscriber who takes the paper for several years and then skips out without paying for it. He is only treated by the individual who, conceit-like, resents the postmaster to write "refused" on his paper, instead of paying the amount legally and honestly due the publisher and snapping it like a nan.

The Cadillac Times says: "The Cadillac, Manistee Valley and Lake Michigan Railway Co. has been formed, with Chas. S. Mayr president, W. E. Dean vice president, J. H. Worley secretary, and S. Gauser treasurer. It is proposed to build a narrow gauge from a point on the G. R. & I. to the lake via Sherman. The exact route has not yet been decided upon, but an effort is being made to make Cadillac the eastern terminus of the road. Our business citizens are becoming interested in the project, and will undoubtedly do their share towards the enterprise.

Epidemics and Temperature.

It has happened over and over again that an epidemic of a particular sort has lingered on for several weeks in a desultory fashion before its real intensity was felt. This was the case with cholera in 1865, when the mortality for the first few weeks remained even below what it has been on the present occasion, rising suddenly to about fifty deaths a day in the middle of October. A sudden rise or fall is generally to be explained by a change in the weather. Nothing is more likely than the decline of an epidemic of cholera in one place, or all over the country when the winter cold begins. On the other hand, the disease usually reaches its height as the temperature goes up, although the rise is not an invariable one. Moisture and heat together are much more likely to cause an increase of cholera than heat alone, or heat, and, in fact, the autumnal months have generally seen a larger mortality than during and summer.—New York Commercial Advertiser.

The Vicious Character of the Tallow Candle.

The air of a room lighted by gas is hardly twenty times as much as if it were lighted to an equal extent by an ordinary electric lamps. When oil lamps are used, the consumption is still more in favor of electricity. You will be surprised to know that our old friend, the tallow candle, and even the wax candle, is far worse than gas in the proportion of the vitiated and the heat produced; and you will be disposed to believe it. But the fact is, that so long as candles were used, light was so expensive that we were obliged to be content with little of it; in fact, we lived in a state of semi-darkness, and in this way we evaded the trouble. It is only since the general introduction of gas and petroleum that we have found what an evil it is.—The Sanitary Engineer.

Earthquakes and Volcanoes.

The theory that there is an intimate connection between earthquakes and volcanoes does not appear to be well founded. There are a number of volcanoes in sections where earthquakes are seldom felt, and earthquakes are frequent where there are no volcanoes. In the regions where both are frequent, there is more or less sympathy between them. The fall of a large portion of the earth's crust into the central sea of molten lava is very liable to start the smoke out of the earth's chimneys, just as a charge of coal thrown into a furnace sends the smoke out of the tall stack. Should a large body of water accompany the falling mass then an explosion takes place, an earthquake shock is felt, and the escaping steam carries ashes and lava out with it.—Pittsburg Dispatch.

HAPPY NEW YEAR.

How the Day was Celebrated in Charlevoix.

Poor sleighing interfered to some extent with the plans for observing New Years Day, but did not prevent a full day of pleasure on the part of those determined to have a good time anyway.

The following is a complete list of the ladies who received:

At the residence of O. D. Wood: Mrs. O. D. Wood, Mrs. L. E. Allen, Mrs. C. J. Strang, Mrs. D. C. Loveday, Mrs. G. W. Crouter, Mrs. N. Alnafie, Miss Annie Cooper, Miss Sadie Inwood, Mrs. J. E. Wood, Mrs. M. J. Stockman, Mrs. J. M. Eaton.

At the residence of E. M. Clark: Mrs. E. M. Clark, Mrs. C. Y. Cook, Mrs. J. A. Carleton, Mrs. A. F. Draper, Mrs. C. H. Dygert, Mrs. E. H. Green, Miss S. C. Graves, Mrs. W. A. Smith, Mrs. F. A. Smith, Mrs. Sterling.

At the residence of John Nicholls: Mrs. John Nicholls, Mrs. R. W. Kane, Mrs. H. S. Harsha, Mrs. J. Moore, Miss Celia Nicholls, Miss Mary Cooper, and Miss Flora Nelson.

At the residence of W. A. Brown: Mrs. W. A. Brown, Mrs. W. P. Brown, Mrs. Oscar Upright, Mrs. F. E. Wood, Miss Minnie Edwards.

At the residence of Frank Shaulot: Mrs. Marius Shaulot, Mrs. Minnie Rexford, Mrs. Ella Smith, and Miss Bertie McLeod.

At the residence of A. D. Cruickshank: Mrs. A. D. Cruickshank, Mrs. C. F. Van Ackeu, and Mrs. Chas. Kelley.

At the residence of L. D. Bartholomew: Mrs. L. D. Bartholomew, Mrs. Amos Fox, and Mrs. Levi Blanchard.

At the residence of D. C. Loveday: Miss Maud Loveday, Miss Orser, Miss Cochran, and Mrs. Hamlinger.

At the residence of O. A. Cooper: Mrs. O. A. Cooper, Mrs. H. C. Cooper, Mrs. G. Bosh, Mrs. M. Olney.

At the residence of Mrs. H. L. Clifford, on Mason Street: Mrs. Clifford, Miss Anna McLeod.

At the residence of A. R. Dyright: Mrs. Upright and Mrs. J. Rose Emrey.

THE DECORATIONS

were very pretty and appropriate, and in a few places quite elaborate,—especially those at the residence of W. A. Brown. With the aid of A. D. Bradbeer the decorations here were preserved in the shape of handsome cabinet photographs. At O. D. Wood's there was a profuse display of flags, of all the important nations of the earth, and a large monument of pop-corn adorned the table. At Mrs. Nicholls' and at Mrs. Cruickshank's there were bells, arches, mottoes, etc., showing excellent taste in arrangement. (Not having been a caller we cannot mention details of decorations.)

THE CALLERS

went mostly in parties, with sleighs. The "Kanes" with a party of 13 gentlemen was the largest in numbers, and completely filled McCabe's bus, drawn by four horses. The most striking features of their costume were pipe bats and linen dusters. They created much merriment with their "music" wherever they went. Their badges announced the following names: A. F. Draper, 1st soprano; Frank Wood, 2d soprano; Geo. Haug, 1st alto; F. A. Cochran, 2d alto; Wm. Covert, 1st baritone; H. H. Miller, 2d baritone; R. W. Miller, 1st tenor; F. W. Crane, 2d tenor; Ben Weaver, 1st bass; Chas. Swallow, 2d bass; H. S. Harsha, 1st Bb bass; Elmer Mayne, 2d Bb bass; R. A. Emrey, bass drum.

The cards of the next largest party announced the names of C. F. Van Ackeu, E. H. Green, J. L. Hurd, C. H. Dygert, Chas. Kelly, and E. M. Clark. Being a sober, steady lot we have no reports to make of any unusual hilarity on their part.

But a party whose cards announced the names of L. E. Allen, C. Y. Cook, M. J. Stockman, and D. C. Loveday, started out prepared for sport, and they found it. It must be remembered that this is the party who received at the residence of L. D. Allen, one year ago, and who made much sport with their numberless burlesques. Stockman's nose is sufficient guarantee of the success of any such scheme. Attached to each card was a bottle, which no lady at first seemed willing to open for fear of one of Stockman's tricks, but when opened were found to contain a very fine quality of cologne. This party was constantly on the lookout for tricks, and luckily escaped a plate of cotton-filled doughnuts at one house especially prepared for them. The greatest joke of all was that they finished the day without having a trick played on them.

Another party of four, whose cards announced the names of L. D. Bartholomew, A. D. Cruickshank, G. W. Crouter, and J. E. Wood, were not so fortunate escaping tricks, and, it is said, two of them bit the doughnuts but failed to get them down.

F. A. Smith, H. Lee Iddings, Al. Washburn, and Alex. Rosenthal, were another happy party, drawn by a lively four horse team.

The Apollo Quartet, consisting of A. D. Bradbeer, W. A. Smith, S. C. Graves, and J. A. Carleton, was another musical party, who gave some of their best selections at each house.

W. A. and G. R. Brown, and Wm. Hanger made a small but lively party.

The outfit of R. W. Kane, and O. A. Cooper, made still another interesting party.

A. J. McLeod, John Bell, and Justin Dixon, made calls singly. If there were any other individual callers their names failed to reach the reporter's note book.

THE CARDS

were mostly plain and inexpensive. The ladies at Mrs. Nicholls' gave a neat badge to each caller, which was the only ladies' badges we noticed except the everlasting bouquets given by the ladies at O. D. Wood's.

The Apollo Quartette and the party of four drawn by four horses gave photos of themselves, (the four in a cabinet card) the latter taken with their outfit decorated, and with A. R. Upright's residence as a background. Dr. Crouter's party gave cards consisting of a folder, inside of which were tied the individual perfumed cards of each member of the party. L. E. Allen's party gave diamond shaped tinted cards, fastened in the point with the bottle of cologne attached. W. A. and G. R. Rowe presented their compliments in the form of well executed drafts and certificates of deposit, which were a decided novelty. The balance of the cards were plain white or tinted, with plain, bevel, or gilt edges, plainly printed. The Kanes had had large badges appropriate with the balance of their outfit.

IN THE EVENING

a large party gathered at the residence of O. D. Wood, although the weather by that time was bitter cold. The remains of the various lunches and refreshment tables were spread out, and the "sampling" began, apparently very much to the satisfaction of the guests. (Of course none of them would own to being hungry after the feasting of the day.) And right here we might say there seemed a rivalry among the ladies in the quality of refreshments, leading one to believe that Charlevoix contained many excellent cooks,—especially in the pastry line. Indeed the table was very choice assortment had not the slight est suspicion of hard times in their composition. Interspersed with the feasting was a musical program consisting of piano solos and duets, and selections by the Apollo quartette and Kazoo band.

At 10 o'clock the party broke up, and left for their homes, but apparently well satisfied with the work of the day,—a day which nearly all will attempt to discount with its pleasures one year later.

The Capriote Women.

The Capriote women, says the London World, are almost invariably handsome and healthy looking. In the course of half an hour's walk you will distinguish in the women and girls you meet pure specimens of Phoenician, Roman, Saracen, Spanish, and Greek types, survivals of the various conquerors of the island. But wait awhile and mostly is the statuesque gracefulness of these girls in all of their movement. However mean her occupation, whether it be carrying building stone or climbing a ladder with a pail of mortar on her head, the Capriote girl will seem to be graceful, and the lines of her body in motion will always call up reminiscences of Greek art. This fact, together with the scenery of the island, its delicious climate, and the cheapness of living, has made Capri a favorite resort of artists of all nations.

Several artists have wived with women of this country—their former rivals—and settled down to a strange life with and half civilized existence. Other residents who, for various reasons have settled in Capri, have very likely taken unto themselves spouses from among the women of the country, and at times resident belong to all nationalities, with perhaps a majority of Anglo-Saxons, you may imagine what a curious, heterogeneous, and thoroughly unconventional affair Capriote society is. A man who has lost the force of character to cut himself adrift from the life of cities and to come and live, year in and year out, in beautiful calm, and sleepy Capri, is a wishy-washy creature from the ordinary standpoint, whom it is supreme bliss to take an excursion train to Herne Bay, where he sits upon the beach, binds a green tam-o'-shanter on his head, and lands on Ramsgate Sand. All the foreign residents in Capri are characters and would repay study, and their loose manner of living would not prove an ungrateful subject for the sociologist.

I. O. O. F. DEDICATION.

Round Lake Lodge Settled in Their New Hall.

Last evening nearly 200 visiting brothers and invited guests assembled at Odd Fellows' hall to witness the ceremonies of dedication, arrangements for which have been in progress several weeks.

The walls and ceiling were handsomely decorated with emblems, mottoes, festoons of evergreen, etc., which added to the impressive ceremony, had a marked effect on those present.

The hall was formally dedicated by Bro. A. D. Cruickshank, acting as M. W. G. M., assisted by S. W., Bro. L. D. Bartholomew, G. M. Bro. G. W. Crouter, G. Sec. Bro. A. J. Mudge, G. Treas. Bro. R. Knight, G. Herald, Bro. O. Blair, J. E. Wood, A. F. Draper, W. A. Brown, and G. Chap. Bro. J. T. Iddings.

The oration of the evening was by G. Chap. Bro. J. T. Iddings, and discussed in a masterly manner the rise of Odd Fellowship, and its relations to society.

After the ceremonies of dedication were concluded, tickets were distributed and the company went to the Fountain City house and enjoyed a sumptuous banquet which had been prepared. The dining room was handsomely decorated with emblems, mottoes, etc., appropriate to the occasion and the tables were loaded with an abundance of good things, tastefully arranged.

At the close of the feast the Appollo Quartette gave a selection and the company dispersed, with many expressions of satisfaction with the evening's entertainment.

Members of the order were in attendance from Petoskey, Traverse City, and from villages in this county and vicinity.

Newspaper Notes.

The Detroit Times reduces its size one column to the page with the new year.

The Charlotte Prohibitionist was changed to eight pages last week, improving its makeup.

A marked feature of the Detroit Times lately is its illustrations. Its new year number is quite a novelty.

The Illinois Grandee again comes up smiling with the new year, apparently rejuvenated with its short rest.

Oh, what cruelty! The Lansing Republican credits J. C. Bontecue with the editorship of the Harbor Springs Republican.

The Kalamazoo Telegraph has two new two revolution Cottrell printing presses,—one for newspaper and the other for book work.

The Grand Traverse Herald devotes a whole page to a department known as "The Traverse Region," composed from correspondences and exchanges. It promises to become one of the most interesting features of the paper.

Joseph Pulitzer drew a check on a New York bank for $232,050, in payment of the balance of the purchase money of the New York World. Joseph has paid $346,000 on the paper, and got $154,000 profit out of it last year.

Business Breezes.

Ore steel and four iron mills resume operations in Pittsburg this week.

The Kimberly iron works and the Valley mill, at Sharon, Pa., have resumed.

At Cammeustung, Pa., the Burke manufactory has received an order which will keep the works in operation for a year.

The North Chicago rolling mills, employing 2,000 men, will resume operations in about three weeks.

A dispatch to the Free Press says interviews with a large number of Chicago business men reveal real evidences on every hand of a good business revival.

Norwood.

The changes that the lumbermen were wishing for last night has come, instead of raining as every one expected, it is snowing like fury.

There are from 12 to 15 teams hauling lumber from the new mill of Gaylies & Nash. It makes things look lively. A very few are hauling logs to the old mill at this place, the new one being about 5 miles away.

The blacksmiths here are complaining about hard times. They have to work from early morning until late at night, and then can't keep up with their work.

Rev. Howe has commenced a series of meetings at this place. He seems a very earnest man in his work so I think it will be productive of much good. There is one thing certain; he don't calculate to have any disturbance in his meetings; those who come there with the calculation of having some fun better stay away, for he means just what he says.

Congregational Church.

At the annual meeting of the society on Monday evening reports of officers were made, showing receipts, disbursements, etc., connected with the current expenses of the society, and of the building committee.

Officers for the ensuing year were elected as follows:

Trustees—J. Mitchell and Wm. Kanage.
Treasurer—J. L. Hurd.
Clerk—R. W. Kane.

The following persons were elected to membership in the society: Mr. and Mrs. W. C. Mears, Mr. and Mrs. C. Pemble, Miss Addie Pemble, Mrs. A. Fox, Miss Bertie Mudge.

The services of dedication will be held one week from next Sunday, conducted by Rev. Mr. Fairfield, D. D., LL.D., of Manistee.

WHAT THE PEOPLE SAY.

They say Upright Emrey & Co. are selling salt pork, salt beef, salt fish and barrel salt cheaper than ever.

They say Upright Emrey & Co.'s cider is pure.

They say Upright Emrey & Co. are ahead on fine teas, coffees and sugars.

They say Upright Emrey & Co. sell five pounds good tea for $1.00.

They say Upright Emrey & Co.'s Lumbermen's socks and rubbers wear well.

"CHINESE GORDON."

A biography of this remarkable man ought to be interesting reading, especially if written by the famous hero-journalist and veteran war correspondent, Archibald Forbes. It is not, therefore, surprising to see numerous editions of it published. First there was the English edition, of course at a high price, then a reprint at $1.00 per copy, by an American "high-priced" publisher; now follows the "Literary Revolution" edition, large handsome type, neat cloth binding, for only 50 cents! The publisher, John B. Alden, 393 Pearl street, New York, will send a 100 page descriptive catalogue of his publications, covering the entire field of standard literature, free to any applicant.

"ALDEN'S JUVENILE GEM"

Is the title of a new illustrated weekly paper for young people, the publication of which begins with the new year. It is a new departure of the prolific "Literary Revolution" and will therefore be examined with particular interest by some hundreds of thousands of readers who have come to look to that enterprise almost exclusively for their reading matter. Its subscription price is only 75 cents a year, though it treats the high priced magazines in the amount and quality of its attractions. A specimen copy will be sent to any applicant forwarding his address by postal card to the publisher, John B. Alden, 393 Pearl street, New York.

M. Deligny, who has under him 40,000 operatives in the copper mines of the province of Huelva, Spain, of which he has been chief engineer since 1848, states that he has never been able to ascertain that any one engaged in the mining industry with which he has been so long connected had died of cholera. The health of the mining population is excellent, and deaths from zymotic diseases are rare among them. M. Deligny mentions that people of rank and wealth at Madrid and other parts of Spain have engaged every available lodging about the copper mines. He stated that the immunity from cholera in the Swedish copper mines is so notorious that in 1864 and 1865 the royal family and court went to live in the Fahlun mines, where there was not a single death from the epidemic.

A Georgia gentleman is reported in the Atlanta Constitution as saying: "I can take forty Jersey cattle on a good farm and make more money than any other farmer ever made with forty negro slaves on the same land. A man who owns a herd of registered Jerseys and a Georgia farm is richer than a man who owned the same number of slaves before the war. If every freed slave in Georgia," said he, warming with the subject, "was replaced to-day with a good Jersey, in ten years Georgia would be richer than if the emancipation proclamation had never been written. You'd better not print this, though, for if you do the Yankees might take a notion to come down and free the cows."

Cyclonia is the name given to an Indian lady who was born during a frightful cyclone in Jamaica two years ago.

BOOM FOR EAST JORDAN.

The Board of Supervisors Decide to Remove the County Seat.

Yesterday afternoon the board of supervisors decided by a vote of 10 to 6 to submit to the people next spring the question of removing the county seat from Charlevoix to East Jordan. The propositions to accept the offer of Charlevoix village, to remove to Boyne, and to Bay Springs had each in turn been voted on and lost.

It now remains for the people to determine which of these two places is the most suitable for a county seat. East Jordan being on the extreme southern border, and nearly as far from the center of the county as Charlevoix.

A Parliamentarian in Arkansas.

The negro chairman of a convention which recently met in Little Rock, rendered an important decision. During a clamor for recognition, the chairman said:

"Let de cheer—let de cheer rule on dis p'int. De cheer rules dat two gentermen kain' talk at de same time. One genterman mus' talk an' arter he gits dun, de udder genterman he ken talk."

"Who's got de flo'?" demanded a delegate.

"Jaloer mine who's got de flo'. Keep on ar axin' yer unpoverentary questions an' yerse'f'll hab de flo'—hab all de flo dat yer kin kiver. I takes dis heah method for ter 'bounce myse'f de nominee for County Judge. All in favor o' de measure will make it known by sayin 'I,' an' dose opposed will please gin up dar seats to passons what's got more sense. De 'I's hab it."—Arkansaw Traveler.

The Effect of Heat.

"How is it the operating expenses of the road are more in summer than in winter?" demanded an irate stockholder who had just been assessed.

"Because the road is longer in summer, and trains have further to run," replied the smiling president. "If the hot spell continues the line may expand so as to make it necessary to cut it off at one end."

And after this stockholder had paid up and left, the president smiled again and sold more stock short, while the secretary figured up another assessment.

The largest sine-producing locality in the world is the district around Galena, Kas. Last year 70,000 tons were mined.

To Consumptives.

THE YEAR'S RECORD.

A Brief Abstract and Chronicle of the Busy World's Doings for 1884.

A Retrospective Glance Into Every Quarter of the Habitable Globe.

Review of the Important Political and Other Occurrences of the Year.

CHRONOLOGY OF 1884.

JANUARY.

The 5d, 11th, and 18th days of the first month of the year were noted for the numerous Arctic exploring expeditions in the Northwest. The ships were entrapped and crushed by the native North American Continent. The more notable events of the month are as follows, with precedence: The Egyptian Ministry resigned, because of its active given the Mahdi by England in relation to the Soudan rebellion. The Spanish Ministry resigned, and a new Cabinet was formed. Henry B. Payne and E. S. Wilson contest United States Senator from Ohio and Mary-land is shaken of the lance; O. C. Martin is elected at Indianapolis. James Nutt shot and killed Jesse James, the famous Missouri outlaw, in Kansas City, Mo. Dr. Joseph H. Allison is elected Mayor of Philadelphia. Ex-President Grant is injured by a wire cable in Wall street. Caron, a carpenter, injured for life, accused of giving information to Lundin, the Chicago detective, for the failure of Lundin's attempt to blow up the Chicago Times office. The National Bank of Commerce, of Pittsburgh, suspends payment. Ex-President Grant's fortunes are restored to him by the Marine Bank, of New York, and the firm becomes Ward, Grant & Co

TEMPERANCE COLUMN.

"It is not likely to touch me—this terrible curse"—Ah, vain boaster, your little know its range and territory. Because you have no trace of its blight in your own family nor in your immediate circle of friends, is no sure sign of immunity. Times change and men change with them. The happy to day becomes often the sad to morrow.

"It has touched me," said a bright and brave young business man the other day, on the railway train. "How is that?" inquired his friend who saw no token on his manly countenance of a blight that so soon makes its mark on the "human face divine." "Well, six months ago, my employer wiun off his balance, signed some notes that he should not have endorsed, and yesterday the firm (a heavy iron firm) went under. So here I am and nearly two thousand others, in dead of winter thrown out of employment." That man's drunken act has touched one comfort and possibly the subsistence of not less than ten thousand human beings.

Not Paid For.

By the law, you may sell to men and women if they want it. You have given bond and you are licensed to sell to them; no one has a right to molest you in your legal business, no matter what families are destroyed or rendered miserable; no matter what wives are treated with violence, what children starve or cry over the degradation of a parent; your business is legalized, and no one may interfere with you in it. No matter what mother may agonize over the loss of a son, or sister blush for the shame of a brother, you have the right to disregard them all and pursue your legal calling; you are licensed. You may fit up for your lawful trade, you may use all your arts to induce visitors, you may skillfully expose to view your choicest wines and enlivening beverages; you may then induce thirst by all contrivances, producing a raging appetite for drinks, and then you may supply to the full, because it is lawful; you have paid for it; you have a license.

You may allow boys, almost children, to frequent your saloons; you may hold the cup to their lips, but you must not let them drink—that is unlawful. But while you have special privileges for the money you pay, this poor privilege of selling to children is denied you. Here the parents have a right to say: Leave my son to me until the law gives you the right to destroy. Do not anticipate that terrible moment when I can assert for him no further right of protection; 'twill be soon enough for me, for his mother, for his sister, for his friends and the community, to see him take his road to death. Give him to us in his childhood at least. Let us have the years of his youth, in which we can enjoy his innocence, to repay, in a small degree, for the love we have lavished upon him.

This is something you who now stand a prisoner at this bar, have not paid for; for this is not embraced in your license. For this offence the court sentences you to ten days' imprisonment in the county jail, and that you pay a fine of seventy-five dollars and costs; and that you stand committed until the fine and costs of this prosecution are paid.

WHO STRUCK BILLY PATTERSONY

A Singular Claim on a False Foundation Sounded by Investigation.

A telegram requesting an old story is about to start on its rounds again, and was received at this office yesterday. The story as told holds out a prospect of a solution to the mystery of "Who struck Billy Patterson?" but unfortunately for those who are very curious to so have the query answered, the narrative is not founded on the bed-rock of truth. It is to the effect that Mr. William Patterson, the father of Mme. Bonaparte, who was a prominent and respected Baltimore merchant, was the "Billy Patterson" who received the mythical blow, and that he offered a reward of $1,000 in his will for the discovery of the perpetrator of the assault. The story goes on to describe the blow as having been given in Franklin County, Georgia, in 1857, the narrator being ignorant that that was two years after the Baltimore merchant's death. It is related that he owned land there which he had bought up on foreclosures of mortgages; that in the course of a riot, in which he wanted to act as peacemaker, he was felled by a blow which so injured him that Mr. Patterson left the reward to

CONTINUE THE SEARCH

for him even after his death. A Mrs. Tennie A. Corey, of Athol, Warren County, N. Y., comes forward as the daughter of the man who struck Billy Patterson, and wants a finger in this mythical $1,000.

The story, as it comes from a correspondent in Atlanta, Ga., says: "Mr. Patterson's will containing the clause perpetuating the reward offered for the discovery of the man who had struck him, is on record in the office of the clerk of the court in the counties of Franklin and Elbert. Mrs. Corey writes to the ordinary of Franklin County as follows:

"My father struck Billy Patterson. It was a great many years ago, or at least I suppose it was, as I was a very small child when he told me about it. He is dead now. As near as I can find out he was wild and mischievous when young, and ran away from his home in Vermont, where he was born and raised by tender parents. He was of a roving disposition, and among other places which he visited was Franklin County, Georgia. As he was fond of sport he attended most of the public sales. He attended the one in Georgia—I say the one in Georgia, because he left Georgia as soon as possible, and never returned to see how Billy Patterson came out. He said when the row began and Mr. Peacemaker, as he called Billy, stuck his name in to break up the sport, he just leveled him, and "slug out" as soon as possible, and

He went to Cleveland, Ohio, and as he grew older and wiser he began to grow stricter, and became as good an enforcer of law as ever on the road, and ran fifteen years on one road, besides others. My mother went from this place to Ohio and married my father, and I was born there. We came back here to live. My father's name was George W. Tilleston. He never knew there was a will made, and I am not sure that he would have cared to have told, as he had money enough; but as I am an invalid I might as well have the money if it is still offered." The ordinary of Franklin County has had a transcript of the will taken, and has forwarded it to Mrs. Corey, at Athol, N. Y. The next story will probably be a demand upon the representatives of the late Mr. Patterson for the money, and, in the event of a refusal to pay it, the matter will become a subject of litigation in one of the United States district courts of New York."

Mr. Patterson's will may be of record in the counties of Franklin and Elbert, Ga., if he had land or other possessions there, but the original will is of record in the Register of Wills' office in Baltimore, where it was hunted up by a Sun reporter, and found to contain no such clause as described in the Georgia story. The will is a very voluminous document. It is a paper which has often been quoted from, and is in some sense historical. It was made in 1827, with various codicils up to the time of his death. The will was proved in February, 1835, a few days after his death.—From the Baltimore Sun.

The Model Wife.

Scripture and history and poetry vie with one another sounding the praises of the model wife. The man who is blessed with a companion worthy the name of a model wife can smile his fingers in the faces of all the old heroes that ever breathed, and give them points each day in every exploit pleasure that makes life worth living. There is no danger of his applying for a divorce.

Unfortunately for the married men of this generation the model wives are most all dead. The struggle for existence was too much for them. The ceaseless, silent, self-sacrifice needed to build up a model domestic character could only be met and borne as long as there was a living appreciation of the personal laws of duty that underlie all sorts of ideal existence. The men who appreciated model wives died when the return willing to be model husbands were so few that the good wives—that is, the model wives—grew discouraged and took to their graves or some more congenial occupation.

The few model wives that are left are cherished by their husbands beyond even their cigars or their horses. The model wife of the workingman, clerk or business man has some appreciation of the 10,000 little labors, petty cares and annoyances that her husband has to go through each day in his workshop or office. She considers that such worrying cares are a part of the duties by which her husband makes a living for himself, for her and for the children, if there are any. And when the husband comes home from his work, tired, perhaps cross, and hungry and out of sorts, she is always ready to meet him with some quiet and gentle good cheer. Her own person is attractive and restful to him. She always has some pleasant scheme in mind to make his home hours delightful to him, and so makes herself indispensable and a constant joy.

The model wife does not see how many poor and silly and exciting things she can say to her tired husband. If she has anything to ask she waits until he is rested and fed. She invites pleasant people to her home, not to show how many rich things she has, but to make her husband's home hours pass cheerfully. She knows that if she is had a woman no other can displace her in her husband's affections. She is always more attractive in her manners to her husband than to other men. She is the genius of the household. But, unfortunately, most of them are dead.—Philadelphia Times.

Zeb Vance's Denominational Experience.

I heard Zeb Vance telling how he captured the vote of a backwoods settlement in North Carolina when he first ran for Congress. He said he had never been in the settlement and did not know the boys. He rode over the mountains and found about sixty sovereigns at a cross-road grocery, and he got down and hitched his horse and began to make their acquaintance and crack his jokes around, and thought he was getting along pretty well with them, but he noticed an old man with shaggy eyebrows and big brass spectacles sitting on a chunk and marking in the sand with a stick. The old man didn't seem to pay any attention to Vance, and after a while Vance concluded that the old man was hell weight on the block and that it was necessary to capture him, so he sidled close up to him and the old man got up and shook himself, and leaned forward on his stick and said solemnly:

"You are Mr. Vance, I believe."

"Yes, sir," said Vance.

"And you have come over here to see my boys about their votes, I believe?"

"Yes, sir," said Vance, "that is my business."

"Well, sir," said the old man, "afore you proceed with that business I would like to ax you a few questions."

"Certainly, sir; certainly," said Vance.

"What church most you belong to?" said the old man.

That was a sockdolager—Vance did not belong to any church. He knew that religion and meeting was a big thing in the backwoods and controlled their politics, but he didn't know what their religion was for North Carolina was powerfully spotted. But he squared himself for his responsibility, and says he: "Well, now, my friend, I will tell you about that, for it is a fair question. Of course it is. Well, you see, my grandfather was born in Scotland, and you know that over in Scotland everybody is a Presbyterian." Here he paused to note the effect, but saw no sign of sympathy with his grandma.

"But my grandmother came from England, and over there everybody belongs to the Episcopal church." He paused again, and the old man marked another mark in the sand and spit his tobacco way off.

"But my father was born in this country in a methodist settlement, and so he grew up a methodist." Still no sign of approval from the old man, and so Vance took his last shot and said: "But my good old mother was a Baptist, and it's my opinion that a man has got to go under water to go to heaven."

The old man walked up and taking him by the hand said: "Well, you are all right, Mr. Vance," and then turning to the crowd, said: "Boys, he'll do, and you may vote for him. I thought he looked like a Baptist." And the old man drew a flask from his coat-tail and handed it to Vance to seal his faith.—Art Arp in Atlanta Constitution.

The horse had stopped and refused to budge, seemingly aware that the two young lady tourists were novices at driving. "Jennie, what in the world shall we do? The outrageous brute refuses to budge." "Laura, there is an awful wicked word that I have heard men use, but—" "Oh, my, we couldn't but—" "Oh, say, I'd tell what won't be wrong; I'll say one-half and you the other; Gosh!" "Darn!" "Gosh!" "Darnit!" "Gosh!" "Darnit!" But, the horse alone sinn. "We don't appear to entertain us, Jennie," said Laura despondently. "No, the horse doesn't seem to budge." "Yes, Laura,"

WASHINGTON.

Secretary McCulloch believes the business depression has reached bottom. A special dispatch from Washington to the Chicago Tribune says:

"Secretary McCulloch states that he has been misrepresented in reference to the business depression. The Secretary says he has not expressed the opinion that greater depression is to be expected. On the contrary, he thinks that every indication points to better times unless Congress is guilty of some grave error, in reference to the revenues, he does not think that the increase of the debt in November and December can be regarded. The revenue for January will be greater than for either of the preceding months, and February will doubtless show a more pronounced improvement. The change for the better in the revenues, as in the business of the country, will be very gradual, and will probably date from the act of January, when the depression reached its worst. The agitation of the silver question, and long delay and uncertainty as to the course to be pursued, would lead to a hoarding of gold that would not make its ill effects very apparent."

There was an increase of $611,384 in the public debt during the month of December. The decrease since June 30, 1881, has been $31,561,984. Following is the official national debt statement issued from the Treasury on the 1st inst.:

Regulations enforcing the recent decision of the Attorney General in reference to the relief of the whiskey gauges have been issued by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue at Washington, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury. The most important amendment in the existing regulations consists in striking out the words "thirty days" in the exportation bonds and substituting such time, not to exceed seven months, as may be reasonably required for exportation. Collectors are also required to list and report monthly all spirits which have remained in warehouse more than three years.

About 300 bills that have passed the Senate will remain in the House unacted upon.

Col. Pike, one of the attorneys who are engaged in the effort to break up the system of leasing Indian lands, says that it will be demonstrated by the progress of the inquiry before the Senate Indian Affairs Committee that the Interior Department at Washington is in the ring, that a regular gang was formed, that all competition was shut out, and that the leases were fraudulently issued.

POLITICAL.

Taxes will fall due this year on 14,500,000 gallons of whiskey. It is doubtful the opinion of the Attorney General, if carried into effect, will necessarily extend the bonded period, but the whiskey men say that they will be satisfied if the intent of the opinion is carried out. Secretary McCulloch is said to be in favor of extending relief to the whiskey interests. Gen. Bacon, ex-Commissioner of Internal Revenue, says that the plan proposed is an easy way out of the difficulty. The Field faction, he declares, will not lose a dollar of revenue.

Erwin, the Republican nominee for speaker, from Cleveland sent in his resignation, but, for the Democratic incumbent. The Nebraska Legislature convened at Lincoln. Church Howe was elected President of the Senate and Mr. Field Speaker of the House. At Lansing the Michigan Legislature elected Republican officers. The House, chose Newcomb, Clark as speaker. Six colored men from Detroit were appointed sergeants, and representation of the Massachusetts legislature was affected by the selection of Dr. Pillsbury as President of the Senate, and J. O. J. Brackett as Speaker. The Colorado Legislature organized at Denver by the selection of James Moynahan as president of the Senate, and Thomas H. Stuart as speaker of the House. Mr. Baker (Republican) was chosen Speaker of the Connecticut House. E. T. Boykin was chosen President of the South Carolina Senate, and Thomas M. Holt was called to the Speaker's chair in the House. In the Maine Legislature, William P. Pennel was chosen to preside over the Senate and Charles Hamlin was installed with the Speaker's gavel. The Legislatures of Pennsylvania, Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, Ohio, and Minnesota also met and organized. The Governor of Ohio in his message, renews his recommendation that in Presidential years the election of State and county officers be held in November. At St. Paul, the message of the Governor of Minnesota was listened to by Alexander Ramsey, a Territorial Governor, and formerly one of the first presidential Governor of that rising State.

The annual meeting of the stockholders of the Charlevoix Mfg. Co. last Tuesday evening, elected the following board of directors for the ensuing year. M. J. Stockman, A. Bathers, A. H. Upright, F. J. Meech, and H. Lee Iddings.

Two large elm logs were brought to Nicholls' mill Tuesday evening, one 43 inches in diameter scaling 1141 feet, and the other 41 inches scaling 1027 feet; both were cut, with three others, from the same tree, and are supposed to be entire.

Alden Chamberlin was arrested on Wednesday by Deputy U. S. Marshal Cooper, on a warrant charging that as owner of the steamer M. W. Wright, he carried passengers on lake Michigan without a license. The matter will be tried in Petoskey.

The Lansing Journal (dem.) says: "Lieut. Gov. Archie Buttars makes a fine presiding officer of the senate. He never gets ruffled, is well up in parliamentary practices, and makes his rulings always quickly and rarely wrongly. He is destined to become one of the most popular lieutenant governors the state ever had."

The card of Armstrong & Co.'s meat market will be found in our columns this week. This firm is furnishing an excellent class of meat of all kinds, and the prices are down with the times. They buy the best fat stock in the county for cash and circulate considerable money in that way, which was counted on by a two thirds vote as follows: Ayes—Supervisors Plettenpace, Myers, Hensley, Jersey, Miller, Jordan, Wooden, Palmiter, Abbey, and Bailey, 10; nays—Supervisors Cruickshank, Frizell, Burgess, Ward, and Harris, 5.

Church Dedication.

Next Sunday morning, the new Congregational church is to be dedicated, the services to be conducted by Rev. Dr. Fairfield, pastor of the Congregational church at Manistee. Dr. Fairfield was president of Hillsdale college twenty years, and chancellor of Nebraska state university five years, and has almost a national reputation in the work of the Congregational church. The services will doubtless be interesting, and a good and invitation is extended to the public to be present.

WORDS OF COMFORT.

We now have on hand a choice lot of fresh roll butter, which is selling rapidly.

A choice lot of cream cheese.—very fine, and at bottom prices.

Our ten at five pounds for $1.00 takes the cake.

Fresh and domestic dried fruits, —peaches, raspberries, cherries, etc.

Catsup, pickles, sauces, spices, etc., at greatly reduced rates.

UPRIGHT, EMERY & CO.

K. O. T. M.

This society, recently organized, is in a prosperous condition and is increasing its membership at a rapid rate considering the times. Last Friday night a party of ten went up to East Jordan to visit the tent at that place, and report a jolly time. Twelve names are now before the society for membership, and initiation in the near future. Regular monthly meetings are held at Odd Fellows hall on the second Thursday of each month.

M. E. Church.

No services next Sunday at the morning hour. Sunday school at the ringing of the bell at 12 o'clock. Sang service to begin promptly at 6 o'clock. Interesting meetings are being held each night this week, and probably continue through next week.

Business Breezes.

Resumptions of business this week include the Western Nail Co., Bellaville, Ill., the Lindell Steel Work, Pittsburgh, the Excelsior Stove Co., St. Louis, the publishing department of the Union iron mills, Pittsburgh, and the O'Hara glass works, Pittsburgh, employing in the aggregate over ten thousand men.

The Muskegon Valley Furniture Co. is now running day and night with a full force of men.

The furnace and chemical works at Elk Rapids will run all winter.

The Manchester coal wood dish factory pays $1,000 per month in wages.

The Alba handle factory will shut down soon for repairs and new machinery.

The Eureka iron works at Wyandotte are about to resume operations with 150 men at 10 per cent reduction from former rates, and if prices hold good, 100 more men will be added later on.

The Wyandotte ship yard is also expected to start up again in a week or two with 50 men.

Over 10,000 iron workers were given employment in Pennsylvania last week.

The national tube works, McKeesport, Pa., resumed Monday morning, re employing 2,500 men.

Norwood.

Thermometer stands at 8° above zero.

Sleighing first class; logs and lumber are moving lively.

Meetings still continue, Rev. Mr. McCartney is assisting; Mr. Howe is the leader.

There was a surprise party at Ernie Harris's last Saturday evening.

A party started from here last Friday evening to surprise Mrs. Dila Cameron of Torch Lake. As she arrived there between 11 and 12 o'clock I think they were surprised.

If you should see a fellow around here with blood in his eye and wax on his mustache, and should ask him his matter, he probably would answer, "the boxing gloves have come" and pass right along. John L. Sullivan better stay his place, for there are more boxers here to the square inch than in any other part of the country but there is not quite so many now as there was before the glove cause.

Burgess.

Elder Robinson is making pastoral calls.

Rev. D. H. Pierce's two daughters are attending school at Horton's Bay.

There is talk of starting a singing school, or class, at the Ross school house.

Moses Cooper received a postal from his brother in law in Ohio, informing him of the serious illness of his wife's father, Mr. Wm. Cratsley, a frequent visitor in this place.

Dr. Lewis had a call one day last week to attend a serious case of diphtheria in Evangeline. His reputation for the successful treatment of this disease is spreading.

Marvelous Engineering.

The London Inner Circle railroad is a marvelous feat of engineering skill, says the Philadelphia Press. It runs throughout its entire distance under the busiest center of the largest city in the world, and the operations attending the excavation and construction have proceeded without serious injury to or interruption of business or traffic. Quicksands have been passed through, beds of rivers spanned, lofty warehouses and massive buildings secured while their foundations have been underminded, and an intricate network of gas and water pipes sustained and in operation have been supplied in the interim from below. Added to this, the main sewers had several times to be reconstructed. Day and night the work has been carried on for eighteen months, and now the engineers are able to announce that their tunnel is complete. The laying of the rails and the building of the stations are the only portions of the undertaking that remains to be done, and in a very short time trains will be passing over the whole of this wonderful subterranean road.

Munich has the largest beer garden and the best beer in Europe. The garden is laid out in a series of large beer halls for 3 cents a quart mug. It is common to see a man sit down and drink all three quart mugs at a sitting. If you see a policeman of people to any street and follow it, it will lead you to a beer garden.

WHEN TO USE THE LASH.

Mr. Henry Bergh Points Out the Advantages of the Whipping-Post.

"There is a marked decrease in the number of cases of cruelty to animals," said Mr. Henry Bergh to a reporter. "Drivers seem to be getting more merciful to their beasts; they understand that horses are property and that it is to their interest not to maltreat them. Then again, these hurly, crud fellows have learned that they can not thrash horse with a bar of iron without danger and almost certainty of arrest. I must say that fear has a great deal to do with the increased kind treatment animals are receiving. I am sorry I cannot attribute the cause entirely to a better motive. In curbing the cruel passions of a man toward the animal, it naturally makes him better toward his family and more humane generally. Yes; the fear of punishment is the most effective method of awakening the humane emotions, especially in that large class who have no moral education or training.

"A few years ago cock-fighting and brutal dog-fighting were common in this city. I have stopped all of that inhumanity, and the only place where they make any pretense to carry it on is at Hunter's Point; and even there, among the roughs and refuse of this city's scum, we go and stop them. Such men, with brutal passions and limited intellects, can only be taught humanity by fear. They are of the class who whip their wives, and for such men we would recommend the whipping-post. True, it is a very severe remedy; but if they retrained from whipping their wives they would not get whipped. The whipping-post would not be used as often as one would suppose, but it would serve as a barrier, and there would not be so much wife-beating. No, it would not break the man's pride or degrade him. He is already degraded and has no pride when he beats his wife. This would whip pride and spirit into him, and make a better man of him. While visiting the prison I conversed with the officials who did the flagellation. They state that it is very rare that a man has to be whipped twice, and that it at once takes the brutal element out of him. Burglars and robbers should be treated that way. Look at Delaware. They would never have a burglary before they would stop in that state. They will not even travel through it they go around it.

"No, I do not think whipping too severe for a man who brutally beats an animal. God gave the animal feeling and the man reason. If he abuses his powers he should be made to suffer. Of course, I refer to extreme cases of cruelty. We have had very few such cases of late. Our greatest trouble is with some of the foreign horse-drivers. They put on their worst stock after midnight, thinking that we are asleep. We often surprise them at 1 or 2 o'clock in the morning by taking out the half-dead horses and causing a blockade of cars. They soon send good horses. Then we have a great deal of trouble with cats and dogs, especially at this season. People going out of the city for a few weeks lock their cats in the houses, leaving them no food or water. They think the cats can catch enough rats, and they naturally want the rats weeded out by their return. In a few days the cats begin extermination, and the neighbors come to us with complaints. We get the key of the house from the agent and liberate the imprisoned felines.

"The other day one attempted to get out of a tenement-house while the family had gone to Coney Island to get a cannon to clean the house of rats. The cat jumped twenty-five feet on the roof of another house, and then rolled down into the water-spout and was caught. Eleven days afterward the cat was accidentally seen, and a report was made to this office. We spliced two ladders, sent a man up to rescue the cat, after it had lived eleven days without eating. Dogs are also locked up by families going out of the city for a few days. No dog naturally feels lonesome and begins to howl, and the annoyed neighbors come to us. It seems that people will never learn the folly of locking up dogs and cats during their absences. It is not only cruelty to the animals, but to the neighborhood," concluded the pioneer humanitarian.—New York Mail and Express.

A Good Pavement.

New York has tried every variety of pavement, from Fifth Avenue—wood, asphalt, square block, cobble-stone, and pebbles innumerable—and none of them have given complete satisfaction, each being open to one or more objections, as too noisy, too costly, or possessing some other defect, says the New Orleans Times-Democrat. The same may be said of any other large city. Long experience has been applied to this from below. Added to this, the streets and their tearing up by gas pipes, because they did not work has been carried on for eighteen months, and now the engineers are able to announce that their tunnel is complete. The laying of the rails and the building of the stations are the only portions of the undertaking that remains to be done, and in a very short time trains will be passing over the whole of this wonderful subterranean road.

New York has tried every variety of pavement, from Fifth Avenue—wood, asphalt, square block, cobble-stone, and pebbles innumerable—and none of them have given complete satisfaction, each being open to one or more objections, as too noisy, too costly, or possessing some other defect, says the New Orleans Times-Democrat. The same may be said of any other large city. Long experience has been applied to this from below. Added to this, the streets and their tearing up by gas pipes, because they did not work has been carried on for eighteen months, and now the engineers are able to announce that their tunnel is complete. The laying of the rails and the building of the stations are the only portions of the undertaking that remains to be done, and in a very short time trains will be passing over the whole of this wonderful subterranean road.

Munich has the largest beer garden and the best beer in Europe. The garden is laid out in a series of large beer halls for 3 cents a quart mug. It is common to see a man sit down and drink all three quart mugs at a sitting. If you see a policeman of people to any street and follow it, it will lead you to a beer garden.

POLITICAL NOTES.

The following from a republican exchange is refreshing, especially when we consider that three months ago, nearly all republicans were predicting the utter ruin of this country in the event of the election of a democratic president: "Now that the New Year has come, grumblers, prophets of evil and those commercial dyspeptics who see ruin staring the nation in the face would better go into retirement and give the country a season of rest. The unlimited resources of this country and the natural advantages enjoyed, are certain to make us a prosperous people, though subject to periods of depression as are all countries, and when the agitator, the reformer, the jaundiced exponent of the commercial wrath to come will hie themselves into the mountains back of Hepsidam and give honest labor and honest capital a chance to combine for the prosperity of the people there will be a business revival that will astonish the world, and we shall become strong and robust, and every branch of industry will soon be pushed to its utmost capacity. The hollow-breasted, wild-eyed disseminators of unrest and discouragement should be promptly relegated to back seats, or permanently removed. Of their croakings the people have had enough."

To Consumptives.

The advertiser having had placed in his hands the formula of a Simple Vegetable Remedy for the speedy and permanent cure of Consumption, Catarrh, Bronchitis, Asthma, and all Throat and Lung affections, after having thoroughly tested its wonderful curative powers in hundreds of cases, feels it his duty to make it known to the suffering fellow men. The recipe will be sent free of charge to all who desire it, with full directions for preparing and using. Address Prof. W. H. AUGUSTINE, 57 Race St., Philadelphia, Pa.

THE GUTTER HERO.

BY WILLIAM LYLE.

Into the gutter he waded,
To unless in the muddy rain;
Stout was his frame not and covered
With rough grey corduroy;
Bold was the face of Bill Bero,
And English was his name,
He carried a sort of knowledge
Dare as humanity's best.

Into the gutter he waded,
Bill Bero, the Bobby in blue,
Pocket-deep in the muddy water
Close into the nine-washed street.
"Mister" called he, as he clutched it,
Anything bit of his hungry palate—
A cinder he passed—but he snapped,
And breathed a hero again.

All amidst by scorn the owner,
Ah! gave up the unmelted gold,
The thrill in his heart rippling
Happier a thousand fold.
"What! heard in the gutter?
Think you, my little man,
Of the little boy on the bank,
As off the little boy on.

Yes, heavily in the gutter,
Think you I'm never here?
Most grime and silt covered he is,
Can grandeur hinder its mean
Mine, hungry and rough he be,
Hungry and rough he be,
Have to relish spot on his record
Because of his pedigree!

Honor is found in no station,
Honest worth in no rank,
And many a noble earth
Is hid in the pots of need,
The man in the world may marvel,
But poverty's pangs are sure
To many a royal bone,
Heart-stirrest by the breath of God.

A GREAT TEMPTATION.

BY LILY M. CURRY.

If any one was to blame, it was Clemence Arlington, who had first conceived the idea. But this young lady, beauty, heiress, only child and mistress of her father's house, was by no means accustomed to having her plans thwarted. It would have been absurd for Fannie Rae to have opposed them. Fannie was a lately acquired protege, whose Miss Arlington delighted in various occasions to caress, shower favors upon, sweat by in matters artistic, and even to patronize. Six years previous the two had been school friends; that was before Fannie had come to the most terrible experience of her life. She had often entertained Clemence at her suburban home, which Clemence had declared a most poetic and romantic place. Later on, Miss Arlington, duly chaperoned, was sent abroad to complete her education, and the two lost sight of each other for a space of three years. During this time such a nervous shock the lass pennilless; father and mother succumbed to the shock, and Fannie stood facing the world homeless orphan. Nerving herself with heroic resolve, she had fortitude set out for the city. She possessed considerable talent for art; had studied some and made far progress. She chose this, therefore, as her profession.

She had been for some time engaged in a dear little sky studio, with just enough pupil, to keep her from starving, and just enough courage to hold despair at bay, when, one day, one late November afternoon, Clemence Arlington walked in upon her. The same old Clemence, very tall and slender for her height; elegantly dressed and characteristic in manner.

She took Fannie's face between her hands and gave her a light kiss on either cheek; after which she decided that Fannie's natural enough emotion was very beconoming, and, moreover, that Fannie's hair in plain, black dress was beautiful as ever, with an intellectual, interesting sort of beauty, not mere pink and white and Grecian features.

She had heard all about her friend's troubles, she had been looking her up, she said presently, since returning from Paris.

"And how are you succeeding?" she went on.

"O, fairly," said Miss Rae, trying to smile.

"Which means you are having an awfully hard time. Never was a real genius yet that didn't. Well, tell me all about it."

And Fannie obeyed with some reluctance.

The act conversing so until the early winter dusk had fallen about them, and they could hardly see each other's faces. Then Miss Arlington suddenly remembered:

"How late it is! And there are a thousand things I want to ask you. Come home with me, can't you? I'm going to the opera to-night. I want you to look at my dress and put a dessert suggestion into it. Come, you can stay all night, I'm sure."

And Fannie, of course, obeyed.

They ambered but time at dinner in the Arlington mansion that evening, immediately after which Mr. Arlington retired to his library to write letters, and Clemence took Fannie up to her own apartments. If Fannie had not been in mourning it would have been Miss Arlington's way to insist upon her friend's accompanying herself and the motherly matron who was to act as chaperon. As it was, Miss Arlington dismissed her maid from the room, immediately the woman had laid out the shimmering satin gown and all its fine accessories.

"Please to look at me," said the heiress, by and by, when she had slipped unaided into her elaborate toilette, "and give me an artistic touch or two."

"I do not see much to alter," said Fannie, seriously.

Clemence, though slender, was beautifully formed and graceful in every movement. Her very long neck bore, like a gleaming column, the dark and hauty face. She wore rare pearls, and carried a bouquet of white carnations.

Miss Rae adjusted her friend's draperies, lengthening lines where possible, and giving touches that should lend do picturesque effect.

Clemence, meanwhile, appeared to grow thoughtful.

"I have an idea about you," she said at length, as she drew on her long gloves.

"About me?"

"Yes; art is all very nice, but, as the poet says, 'art is long and life is fleeting,' and I have made up my mind to establish you; in other words, to get you a husband!"

"A husband!"

"Yes; you are too beautiful and interesting to have your best years wasted. That's the trouble with all the famous women, don't you know—they're mostly old and hideous. It's because they have had to make shows of themselves. Now, I would like to see you become famous, but you might as well enjoy life meanwhile. If you had a home of your own, you could get on twice as fast. You've got a great deal in your favor," Clemence went on, "looking at it in a practical way. You are of good family, for one thing; they can't put up their eye glasses and say, 'Only fancy! Who is she?'"

Fannie sighed.

"I am sure I don't know how I should succeed, Clemence. I'm afraid my art would amount to very little, if it were not a case of necessity. Necessity is a great master—

"There, there! Don't say another word; I can't argue. I'll talk to you in the morning."

Miss Arlington was scarcely attentive to the music that evening. She conversed more than was her usual with the various gentlemen who came to pay their respects to herself and chaperon. Among these was one who seemed especially to claim her consideration—a fine-faced man of perhaps 40. Clemence spoke with the freedom of long acquaintance.

"You have neglected us lately. Only yesterday papa was wondering why you stayed away."

"I have been out of town," said this gentleman. "I had thought to call upon you to-morrow.

"Pray do. I know papa will be delighted. Cannot you dine with us, quite alone, you know, at 7? Do!"

Whereupon he promised, and went away.

Clemence was very mysterious in her manner the following morning, when she breakfasted alone with Fannie Rae.

"I think I have found him," she said, after a time.

Fannie looked innocent.

"Found whom?"

"The happy bridegroom-to-be."

"O, Clemence—"

"Now, dear, that is very nice and proper; that deprecation, that reproach. Nevertheless I have found him. His name is Elliot Lindsey. He and hurried out into the chilly winter morning.

Clemence was very much in earnest. Early in next day she called at Fannie's studio.

"See here, my dear," she said, authoritatively, "I can not wear my life out climbing these horrid stairs."

"I know," Fannie responded, sympathetically; "they are awful."

"At the same time," Clemence proceeded, "I must see you every day. Now, the best thing, and the only thing for you to do, is to come and stay at our house this winter."

Miss Rae was busy cleaning a palette. She did not speak at once, offering direct protest, which Clemence was prepared to combat. She waited a little, still working away at the palette.

"It's very kind of you, Clemence," she said at length, in a tired voice, which seemed inclined to tremble, "I know you wouldn't suggest anything unless you meant it. I am so discouraged. It is so hard to make mere expenses—" her voice broke; a single tear fell upon the paintbrush in her hand.

Tone passed with singular swiftness, when Fannie found herself installed as a member of the Arlington household. The weeks fairly flew. She spent only the mornings at her studio; Clemence always had something to occupy her afternoon and evening.

Elliot Lindsay was a frequent visitor. Ere long Miss Rae was forced to admit he appeared interested in her.

Clemence was jubilant at the prospect of success.

"I don't see how he could help falling in love with you," she said. "Do you know, Fannie Rae, that you are a very beautiful girl? You have a delicate, spiritually, uncommon sort of beauty. You have that tender, timid look in your blue eyes, that is magnificent. . . . And everything is sure to come right. Did what makes you sigh?"

"Did I sigh?" asked Fannie, looking plainly lugubrious. She could not bring herself to confess the uneasiness which was slowly developing into heartache.

She was beginning to realize her feelings toward Elliot Lindsay; to entertain the convictions that she could never love him. Reason, conscience, force were all; she liked him very much; she could not love him. And as the weeks passed she knew that he had come to care for her in a way which could have but one ending.

She began to wonder what she should say to him. Stooping to shock and hurt to become his wife? Could she consent? She shivered at the thought. Suppose he asked her if she loved him? She must speak the truth. Then, would he be content? Would she be happy, or wretched for all her life? She grew sick and feverish with this infernal conflict.

But Clemence was overjoyed at the approaching result of her labors.

Late one afternoon in February, Miss Arlington's bonder seemed a cozy place. The firelight threw a rosy tint upon the tinted hangings of the room, a strip of orange sunset was visible through the purple dusk, where the window curtains fell as yet apart.

Fannie was watching this with unspeakable eagerness, and rocking slowly to and fro in a deep rocking-chair. Clemence was curled up on a low seat before the grate. She glanced up occasionally at a golden clock, which among their talk from time to time quite the mantel.

"I married"—she was beginning, when a servant brought up Mr. Elliot Lindsey's card, "for Miss Rae."

As the door closed upon the man, Clemence sprang up with low, triumphant note.

"He has asked for you! You understand?"

Miss Rae remained seated. She spoke feebly, as if dazed.

"Clemence, I—I daren't go down. I am—afraid."

"Afraid? Nonsense! Be brave. You know what he has to say. There is no one I would rather see you marry. He will be so good to you."

"But I—I don't love him. I like him—but I can't—love him." She had risen, and was moving toward the door. Her voice was desperate, and her face twisted pitifully before her. "I know you've been very kind, Clemence, giving me dresses and things to wear; you've done it all for the best. Perhaps I've tried hard to care for him. And it is such a great temptation."

"What do you mean to do?" asked Clemence, curiously.

"I mean to be honest, and tell him I'll—I'll do my best—but I—can't love him."

"Fannie!" Clemence had sprung before her, passionate and imperious. "You won't tell him that. You mustn't, you shan't! I will not allow you to spoil everything!"

"Spoil everything?" Fannie repeated, laughing hysterically. "Do you call my happiness everything? Do you, pray, Clemence. Perhaps—I don't know. At least he has not spoken yet."

"Clemence stopped and her face fell.

"Fannie, for heaven's sake, don't throw away this chance! Don't be foolish—reflect how much it all means!"

The slim, little black-robed figure passed slowly from the room.

"Fannie, wait! Fannie!" Clemence's words still rang in the girl's ears. "Don't throw away this chance. Reflect how much it means!"

Surely Clemence had a right to say these things. Clemence had done so much for her in the past three months. Clemence had longed to secure her a happy future. Clemence would be so disappointed! Instead of all that Clemence had desired for her, she would go back to the troubles of the past—the gloom of a boarding house, the slender income from her pupils and what few others she could glean. She would be, indeed, destitute; and here, here was sure escape. Oh it was a great temptation, a great temptation! She was busy with conflicting thoughts.

She groped her way slowly to the hall, and entered the drawing-room.

"I asked for you," he said, with great emphasis, when they had exchanged greetings. "I think you must know why I asked for you." * * She could only look at him while he spoke. They were sitting side by side upon a sofa, yet she felt as if she must shrink from him. * * * Especially if she wanted to—deserve him.

She could hear other sounds than his low voice. She could hear the words of Clemence Arlington, a ringing sort of monotone. She could see everything about her with unusual clearness. The luxury of the drawing-room came upon her with a mighty pressure. Her heart went out with passionate yearning to all things beautiful. She craved delight and comfort as her due.

She heard him speaking, yet she could not look upon him. His voice, falling distinctly upon the light and warmth in which she rested, was like that of some one speaking sentence which should consign her to everlasting darkness and misery.

"I hope," he said, "I hope that you can care for me."

And now she knew that she must speak. Slowly her gaze to rest upon his faces. How gray his eyes were! What an anxious light they held. She remembered that after-ward, and she remembered, noting just how carefully his hair was brushed away from his forehead. * * *

"I am sorry," that assumed the burden of her answer. She had risen, and he, too, stood up and leaned compassionately to her. "I am sorry; you must forgive me—I did not deserve it. * * * She trembled on the verge of sobbing. "I thought I should care for you—in that way—but now I know how I should wrong you. Only believe—that I am sorry. I shall just go back to my hard lot—you can never know. It has been a great temptation!

He fell back, pale and startled.

"You don't care for me?" he said, with piteous comprehension. "Well, I am sorry."

But she sprang toward him, impulsive, fearful.

"No, no! I do care—only not in that way—too much to wrong you. Do not think—I am sorry."

"Hush!" he said, gently; "do not cry, dear child, do not cry. * * * Shall we be friends? * * * Perhaps in time you may care for me as I would have you care for you. * * * Only do not cry!"

Six months later they were married, and Clemence Arlington declares she never met a man who pleased her half then Fannie Rae. But a woman's heart is something beyond the comprehension of ordinary minds.

In public, the box is the proper mode of salutation, also, under certain circumstances, in private and everyday life. In other circumstances, it should be familiar, cordial, respectful, or formal. In relinquishing the head or a gesture with the hand or cane suffices between men, except when one wishes to be specially deferential to age or position; but in military life, a salute is always to be rendered. A very common mode of doing this is to raise the right hand, palm to the front, as if to shield the face from the sun, and sling it on as hastily as possible, the haste is incompatible with grace, and as there is an odd quantaminess in the movement it cannot be held for a longer or shorter space than the jerk and sling manner of removing the hat, in salutation, is not to be commended. The empresement a man puts into his salutations is proportionate to circumstances, the most deferential manner being to carry the hat down the full length of the arm, keeping it there until the person saluted has passed. If a man stops to speak to a lady in the street he should remain uncovered, unless the conversation should be protracted, which it is sure not to be, if either of the party knows and cares to observe the proprieties.

A well-bred man, meeting a lady in a public place, though she is a near relative—wife, mother, or sister—and, though he may have parted from her but half an hour before, will salute her as deferentially as he would salute a mere acquaintance. The passers-by are ignorant of the relationship, and to them his deferential manner says: "She is a lady."—The Mentor, by Alfred Ayres.

How Coffee Is Graded.

The reason that Rio coffee is not quoted high in this market is that only the lower grades of Brazilian coffee are called Rio coffee. The best coffee is called "Java, Mocha," etc. You see the planters send their coffee to Rio, and there it is all mixed together, the good and the bad, in order to get an average price. When it gets here it is taken to large coffee houses, where the work done in Rio is undone, the coffee being sorted out into different grades, and various names given it. The lowest grade is called Rio. As a matter of fact, some of the best coffee we get comes from Brazil.—Salvador de Mercado, Brazilian Consul.

The Petoskey W. C. T. U. numbers one hundred and thirty-four paying members enrolled, and fifteen honorary members.

In Charlotte the I. O. G. T. and W. C. T. U. work together in the matter of entertainment, giving a social entertainment every alternate Friday evening. This gives an increased interest in the work of both societies.

Teach the Children.

There is, probably, no hallucination so obstinate as that which attributes to alcoholic drink a certain virtue, which it never possessed. After all the influences of the pulpit and the press, after all the warning examples of drunkenness and consequent destruction, after all the testimony of science and experience, there lingers in the average mind an impression that there is something good in alcohol, even for the healthy man. Boys and young men do not shun the wine cup as a poisoner of blood and thought and the most dangerous drug that they can possibly handle; but they have an idea that the temperance man is a fogy, or foe to a free, social life, whose practices are ascetic, and whose warnings are to be laughed at and disregarded. Now in alcohol, in its various forms, we have a foe to the human race so subtle and so powerful that it destroys human beings by the million, vitiates all the processes of these who indulge in it, degrades morals, induces pauperism and crime in the superlative degree when compared with other causes, and corrupts the homes of millions.

It is a cruel thing to send a boy out into the world untaught that alcohol in any form is fire, and will certainly burn him if he puts it into his stomach. It is a cruel thing to educate a boy in such a way that he has no adequate idea of the dangers that beset his path. It is a mean thing to send a boy out to take his place in society without understanding the relations of temperance to his own safety and prosperity, and to the safety and prosperity of society.

What we want in our schools is to do away with the force of a pernicious example and a long-cherished error, by making the children thoroughly intelligent on this subject of alcohol. They should be taught the natural effect of alcohol upon the processes of animal life. (1) They should be taught that it can add nothing whatever to the vital forces or to the vital tissues, that it never enters into the elements of structure, and that, in the healthy organism, it is always a burden or disturbing force. (2) They should be taught that it invariably disturbs the operation of the brain, and that the mind can get nothing from alcohol of help that is to be relied upon. (3) They should be taught that alcohol influences the baser passions, blunts the sensibilities, and debauses the feelings. (4) They should be taught that an appetite for drink is certainly developed by those who use it, which is dangerous to life, destructive of health of body and peace of mind, and in millions of instances ruinous to fortune and to all the high interests of the soul. (5) They should be taught that the crime and pauperism of society flow as naturally from alcohol as any effect whatever naturally flows from its competent cause. (6) They should be taught that drink is the responsible cause of most of the poverty and want of the world. So long as six hundred million dollars are annually spent for drink in this country, every ounce of which was made by the destruction of bread, and not one ounce of which has ever entered into the sum of national wealth, having nothing to show for its cost but diseased stomachs, degraded homes, destroyed industry, increased pauperism and aggravated crime, them boys should understand the facts, and be able to act upon them in their first response to the conduit.

The national wealth goes into the ground. If we could only manage to bury it without having it pass slitherward in the form of a poisonous fluid through the inflamed bodies of our neighbors and friends, happy should we be. But this great, abominable curse dominates the world. The tramp reminds us of it as he begs for a night's lodging. The widow and the fatherless tell us of it as they ask for bread. It scowls upon us from the hovels and haunts of the poor everywhere. Even the clean, hardworking man of prosperity cannot enjoy his earnings because the world is full of misery from drink. The more thoroughly we can instruct the young concerning this dominating evil of our time the better will it be for them and for the world.—Dr. J. G. Holland.

C. L. LOCKWOOD, G. P. Ag., Grand Rapids, Mich.

DEFAULT having been made in the payment of money according to the conditions of a certain mortgage dated the 4th day of August, A. D. 1882, executed by William T. Addis, and Meta Addis, his wife, to John J. Hinze, and recorded in the office of the register of deeds, in and for Charlevoix county, and State of Michigan, in liber "B" of mortgages, on page 184, the sum of two hundred and thirty one dollars and fifty cents, which said mortgage was duly assigned by said John J. Hinze to the undersigned, by an assignment dated the 4th day of August, A. D. 1882, and recorded in said register of deeds, of the county of Charlevoix, state of Michigan. Such conditions requiring the payment of three hundred dollars with one year from date, viz: October first, A. D. 1882, with annual interest October first, A. D. 1883, and October first, A. D. 1884, and October first, A. D. 1885. The two hundred dollars with annual interest due October first, A. D. 1882, not yet having been paid, by reason of which default there is now claimed to be due, and is due, and payable on said mortgage at the date of this notice the sum of two hundred and thirty one dollars and fifty cents, principal and interest, and no proceedings at law having been made to collect said debt or any part thereof. By virtue of the power of sale in said mortgage contained and of the statute in such case made and provided, notice is hereby given that on Saturday the 21st day of February, A. D. 1885, at one o'clock in the afternoon, at the front door of the Lewis block, in the village of Charlevoix, in said county of Charlevoix, and state of Michigan that being the place where the circuit court for said county of Charlevoix is holden, there will be sold at public vendue, to the highest bidder, the premises described in said mortgage, and all that certain piece or parcel of land situate and being in the township of Evangeline, county of Charlevoix, and state of Michigan, and described as follows, to wit: The south half of the north west quarter (s½ of section thirty six (36) in township thirty (30) north of range seven (7) west containing eighty (80) acres of land according to the original survey, be the same more or less.

Dated Oct. 22, 1884.

JOHN J. DUNN, Mortgagee.
THOMAS J. HIZE,
Agent of Mortgagee.

WHEREAS, default has been made in the payment of the money secured by a mortgage dated the eleventh day of October, A. D. 1883, executed by Ira Davis and Ann Davis, of Charlevoix, Michigan, to Samuel A. Gibbons, of Kalamazoo, Michigan, which said mortgage was recorded in the office of the register of deeds in the County of Charlevoix, in liber "N" of mortgages, on page 34, on the 30th day of October, A. D. 1883, at one o'clock p. m. And whereas, the amount now claimed to be due on said mortgage at the date of this notice is the sum of Sixty-one dollars and Sixty cents, of principal and interest, and default in the payment aforesaid has been made and no suit nor proceeding at law has been instituted to recover the debt now remaining secured by said mortgage, or any part thereof whereby the power of sale contained in said mortgage has become operative. Now, therefore, notice is hereby given that by virtue of the said power of sale, and in pursuance of the statute in such case made and provided, the premises described in said mortgage, viz: Lots one (1) and two (2) in Davis' public addition, to the highest bidder, at the front door of Lewis Hall, in the village of Charlevoix, in said county of Charlevoix (that being the place where the circuit court for the county of Charlevoix is held), on the third day of April, A. D. 1885, at one o'clock in the afternoon of that day, at public vendue, to satisfy said mortgage as follows, to wit: Lots Thirty-one (31), Thirty-five (35), and Thirty-six (36), of Crooks and Hulburt's addition to the village of Charlevoix, according to the recorded plat thereof.

Dated at Charlevoix, Michigan, this 6th day of January, A. D. 1885.

SPONGES.

A Place Where "Sponging" is the Regular and Congenial Business.

There is no single industry of so much financial importance in Nassau, I think, as the sponge fisheries. "Sponging" is a regular business in Nassau, of such large proportions that a Sponge Exchange has been established, governed by rules on the plan of the Stock Exchange; and to do a sponge business successfully in Nassau a firm must be represented in the Exchange. Sponge is an important thing in Nassau. It is plenty, of course, and cheap. You see sponges lying in the streets and kicking about the wharves that in New York we would have to pay fifty cents or $1 for. Wherever sponge can be used in place of cotton or woolen cloth it is used. Kitchen tables are sponged for "tablecloths," and frequently the seat in a boat is nothing but an immense sponge as big as half a barrel. Windows are invariably washed with them, grasses pulled with them, and they are used for almost every conceivable purpose. Around the hotel in the winter are always two or three "boys" with long string of them, trying to sell them to the Americans. Hardly any visitor leaves Nassau without taking a few of them along. I bought a string of about fifteen sponges that stretched out far higher than my head, for "one-and-six," or thirty-seven and a half cents. They make very fine presents to give to your friends when you get home, they are so cheap, and a sponge is more valuable when you know it has just been brought by enterprising you know from the sponge fisheries.

Too sponging boat is composed of small steamers ranging from ten to forty tons. Each schooner carries from four to six men, and makes periodical trips out to the sponge beds around Andros, Andros Island and Exuma. The men do not dive for them, as sponge fishers in the Mediterranean do, but use long-handled iron rakes like oyster tongs to fish them out of the water. In this clear water they can see every inch of the bottom, make up their mind to what sponges to take, and select one of one carefully, detach it from the rock to which it clings, and lift it into the boat. They are not the sober, decorous, high-souled things we see in sponge windows. When taken first from the water they look and feel more like a piece of raw liver than anything else I can compare them with. They are slippery, slimy, ugly, and smell bad. Their color is generally a sort of brown, very much like the color of gun wood, only a little darker. Most people are taught, in their days of freshness and innocence, that the sponge is an animal, and when they visit Nassau they expect, perhaps, to see sponges swimming about the harbor, if indeed they do not surprise some of the more adventurous in taking trees or making little excursions over the piles. But they are disappointed when they learn that the animal part disappears entirely long before the sponge reaches a market, and that the part we use for bathing in Paris is only his house, the many-roomed residence in which he mentioned himself while in his sea. After the sponges reach the deck of the vessel they are cleaned and dried and go through a curing process. They then become the sponges of commerce, and are divided into eight varieties in the Bahamas. Some, called "transparent," or "sheepswool," are so fine and soft as silk and very strong. Others, although large and perhaps tough, are coarse and comparatively worthless. There are, too, bunches of sponges, silk sponges, wire sponges, and finger and glove sponges. The process for curing them, I believe, is to keep them on deck for two or three days, which "sets" them. Then they are put in a crate and kept there for eight or ten days, and are afterward cleaned and bleached in the sun on the beach. When they reach Nassau the crates are rotted, and the sponges are trimmed and dressed for exportation.

Ocean Steamer Gambling.

Thomas Hughes, Q. C., the author of "Tom Brown's School Days at Rugby," arrived in this city on the City of Rome, en route for Rugby, Tenn. When seen by a Herald reporter he was tired with enthusiasm, and as much in relation to the new Rugby and its prospect school, as about a row that had occurred on the steamer while coming over.

"There was on the deck of the steamer," he explained, "two rooms—one a smoking room and one a reading room. The reading room is supposed to be for the use of the ladies as well as the gentlemen. Monday, the third day out, they turned the room into a card room and smoking room, by going on with cards, draughts, etc. All day. Well, I went off to the smoking room and found that there had been a baccarat bank started there. A man from Australia is—a perfectly good, honest fellow he was, but he made his living that way—had started the game with three other men, all middle aged. The bank was a perfectly square one, and the pay entirely honest, so far as I know and believe.

"This was kept up all day, and up to the time of packing out the lights and going to bed, and early on after that, from 11 o'clock in the morning until bed time, this baccarat bank was kept going, and there was much of the time a row of players five or six deep around the game. Many of these were mere boys, lads of 20 or less, who were allowed to paint their stakes or clothes on the cloth. The stake was sometimes up to £5, I believe.

"Now, I do not object to the baccarat going on, but what I did object to was its being carried on openly and the boys being allowed to join in the game. And I objected, as did many others, to the reading room being made inaccessible to the ladies. So one of the passengers, a friend of mine, drew me a memorial, and I led the signatures with my own. It was signed by a large number of the passengers.

"This paper was laying on the saloon table and the passengers were signing it in great numbers, when I was told that information named Lord was up on deck talking about it and urging all sorts of lies about what we were doing. I went right up and spoke to him. I asked him if he had read the memorial and he admitted that he had not. Then a friend of mine, a young American gentleman, struck one of the other side. Of course we stopped them at once, but there was some sharp discussions afterwards and a great deal of hard feeling.

"Since we landed," he continued, "we have presented the memorial to the agents here, and they say they do not propose to do anything about it, so I want the press to take it up. It is going to do a great deal of hurt if our youth are to be exposed to this temptation. A great proportion of the travelers on these steamers are mere boys, and I do not think it right or proper that they should be subjected to any game of this kind. Baccarat is not allowed in any of our clubs in London, and it seems a pity that it should be played openly on the steamers."—New York Herald.

Alpine Grapevines.

At Giroulen, altitude 1,500 feet, the first grapevines on the Italian slopes of the Alps were seen. The village churchyards are adorned with little painted chapels, sometimes as many as four or five to a single cemetery. The river has swollen to about 8,000 inches. The mountains rise from 2,000 to 5,000 feet above its bed. There are no terraces as yet. The bed of the river is paved and walled in with cubes of stone. Each village has a stone church with a clang of bells and a quaint pulpit on its front wall representing the crucifixion, the Madonna, or some other religious scene. The vines are trained across supported by posts of rough granite. No picturesque costumes; the peasants are all dressed in modern clothes and resemble French men and women, only their hair is more commonly brown than black. Many of the men wear white shirts, and altogether present a more thrifty appearance than I expected. At Bionecon, altitude 1,160 feet, there is a public hydrant at the railroad station, the first instance of such a convenience since leaving Paris. Nowhere else throughout France, Germany, Switzerland, nor Italy, thus far, may the traveler wash his hands or obtain a drink of water without paying for it. The valley is dashed, a mile wide, and alpen of gold-mining appear near the river bars. The only distance it could have done in the country was to lessen the cultivable portion of the valley about one-fourth of a mile. Slabs of flagstones are employed to line and fence in the railway—probably schistose slate. The Ticino here looks like the Upper Korn. Notwithstanding the guidebooks, which describe this valley as "richly cultivated, a succession of gardens," etc., the culture thus far is fragmentary and sparse, consisting chiefly of rye and hay patches on the flats and little grape gardens on terraces.—Cor. San Francisco Chronicle.

Nugget Jewelry.

The rare jewelry is rough, crusty gold, eighteen carats fine, studded with minute jewels, which stand out like the plums in a Christmas pudding. The chain and ball seems to be the leading style in the novelties held out by Durand, the famous New York fashioner. The chain is very fine and the ball perfectly round, and about the size of an English sixpenny piece. These are intended to ladies' fob chains, an elegant new trifle, and the ends of bracelets, and are also worn as earrings. The balls are studded with tiny rubies, or with turquoise and diamonds, and many of the chains have fine jewels worked into them. The barbaric yet stylish hoop earring has returned in the shape of a semicircle of nugget gold, and is now in high favor. A new enrancement fluer is a lover's knot of dead rough gold. A popular style of pin is a gold horseshoe set in a wrought-gold nail head—good luck. The Langtry bracelet is composed of several strands of fine gold chain, each one ending in a bell pendant gemmed or enameled. The bells are fine stamen, and not rather flower and insert jewelry is entirely passe.

A Brooklyn letter carrier says: "It is a curious thing that I am never asked the way by the Chinese. All other nationalities bother with their questions along the bridge, the railroad, etc., but John Chinaman, strangely enough, every time knows where he is going and the way to get there."

The committee consists of representatives of various commercial organizations interested in the improvement of Western waterways.

Secretary of the Treasury McCulloch says that he is not in favor of reducing the whisky tax, as has been reported, from 90 to 70 cents. He thinks, however, that it would be desirable to so amend the internal revenue laws as to require the payment of the tax only upon withdrawal for consumption. The Secretary is opposed to a reduction of the tax on distilled spirits. In regard to the bonded warehouse period, he thinks that it should be indefinitely extended or done away with, and that the tax should be collected only when the spirits are withdrawn for consumption.

The bill to repeal the pre-emption, desert lands, and timber-culture laws, and to amend the homestead law, which passed the Senate last week, is an important measure. Following is a synopsis:

Section 1 provides for the repeal of the pre-emption law. This repeal, however, does not affect the rights of any person who has made a pre-emption under the act. It further provides that no right of pre-emption shall have had the benefit of the pre-emption law not shall have failed from any cause to perfect the title to the land so entered by reason of any error in the entry, or shall have since taken a second homestead under the act of the pre-emption law, which is repealed.

Sec. 2 repeals the timber culture law, with the proviso that it shall not impair the rights of any person who shall have made a timber culture entry.

Sec. 3 amends the desert lands act so that persons who have settled themselves on the homestead, or who have made a timber culture or pre-emption entry, may make final proof for the entire, provided they file the preliminary affidavit mentioned before.

Sec. 4 repeals the desert land act, except as to the rights of persons who have entered under the act.

Sec. 5 provides that no public lands except Alabama military or other reservations, mineral lands, and other lands, the sale of which has been authorized by special act of Congress, shall be sold at public auction or by special proclamation of the President, and that no sale shall be made from the market, and shall be disposed of as unentered public lands.

Washington telegram: "Gen. Sherman said today that he should not under any circumstances report to the House the bill for the relief of Gen. Fitz John Porter. Gen. Grant on the retired list, but not mentioning his name, he declared he should report the other bill, which also was introduced at the request of the President vetoed it if he still thought his action was in accordance with the John Porter bill, and vice versa. Gen. Rosecrans, chairman of the Senate Military Committee, is utterly opposed to putting Grant on the retired list. He says he is not in favor of recognizing in any way the late Boss of Grant & Ward."

The Independent and Conservative banking house of John J. Cisco's sons failed at New York, with liabilities of as been claimed. John J. Cisco, founder of the house, died last March, and John J., his son, succeeded the head of the firm. The fact that the firm did not do a speculative business to any great extent; that it received very large deposits from reasonable persons and corporations; that it had acted as fiscal agents for several railroads and as correspondents for several national bank houses; that it did a large business in issuing letters of credit to travelers in Europe all these things made the failure more disastrous to depositors. The interest was heightened by the additional fact that the firm acted as the bankers of the Trinity Church corporation, of which its founder was a prominent member, and at the time of his death he was the senior warden and personal friend of the Rev. Dr. Dix. Lewis May, the assignee, says the liabilities are the entirely trade-persons and amounts $2,000,000. John J. Cisco established the firm in 1837, and never became the creature of any other house. Frederick Cisco, of Chicago, his nephew, recently retired from the firm, and is said to be worth a million. In his will he left Mr. Lamar said the firm was perfectly solvent. Mr. Sherman, who met the house shortly before the failure, said: "I have known Mr. Cisco, Sr., for years, and have always had the highest opinion of him. I saw him with Frederick W. Devin as partner, and he was supposed to have made a fortune." Mr. Cisco, Jr., was supposed to have had $100,000 capital.

The Congregational Church Dedicated.

Last Sunday morning the new Congregational church was dedicated, the people of all denominations to witness the service and ceremonies of dedication. The service was opened with a fervid prayer by Rev. C. F. VanAnken and followed with an appropriate selection by the Congregational choir assisted by the Apollo Quartette. The scriptural reading was by Rev. J. T. Billings of the M. E. church, and prayer was offered by Rev. J. J. Kanaay. The dedictory sermon was delivered by E. B. Fairfield, D. D., LL.D., of Manistee, from the text, "Open then unto me, that I may enter, and worship. Things out of Thy law." —Psalm cxix, verse 18. This discourse was the best exposition of the real value and the divine authority of the bible to which we have ever had the pleasure of listening. All other books fade into insignificance under the Doctor's comparisons. At the close of the sermon, a statement of the condition of the building fund was made, showing a total expenditure of $5,700 for lot, building, fixtures, and furnishing. Of this amount $4,700 had been provided for, leaving an indebtedness of $800. Subscriptions were then received amounting to $470, and the morning service closed with a dedicatory prayer by the pastor, Rev. C. F. Van Anken.

In the evening, Dr. Fairfield talked one hour about his recent trip in Palestine, and especially of what he saw in Jerusalem. His rambles and explorations among the ruins of the temple, how he learned of the quarry from which the great blocks of stone were taken, and that he saw them were intensely interesting, and the audience were disappointed when he announced the time to close, and called for the remaining $300 to free the church from debt. The amount was soon raised and the audience dismissed.

Dr. Fairfield carries his audiences with him, and makes them almost see and feel the same sights and sensations as himself throughout his discourse. In the travels from Joppa to Jerusalem, and in the ramblings about the latter city, there was a possession from which the observer could not for a moment permit his attention to be diverted.

When all the circumstances are considered, the pastor and society have reason to feel proud of their work, and thankful to all who have so materially assisted in hastening its completion. Although it may not be so large and expensive a building as many others in northern Michigan, it is well constructed, well finished, and when the furnishings are complete it will be a very pleasant and comfortable house of worship.

Sensation at Lansing.

Our representative at Lansing, Mr. Hampton, is making quite a stir, among the legislators by certain criticisms of the actions of representative Egan and others during the organization of the House, which appeared in last week's Independent. What the result will be, is a question to be watched with interest.

Pending the investigation, Mr. Hampton will avoid further criticism. In his last letter he says: "Until the question is decided whether or not my holding a seat in the House prevents me from exercising my rights and duties as an editor, I shall withhold criticism, even upon those matters which in my opinion demand ventilation."

Dr. Reynolds Coming.

The Elk Rapids Progress says: "Dr. Henry A. Reynolds, the well known temperance reformer began a series of temperance meetings at the town hall last Sunday afternoon. A fair audience welcomed the Doctor at this, the beginning of what has proved to be the most successful effort ever made in Elk Rapids in the cause of temperance. The afternoon meeting was only preliminary to what was to follow in the conduct of the meetings. In the evening the large hall was filled to hear the reformer depict the evils of intemperance. The Doctor makes no pretentions to oratory or eloquence but deals in the stern logic of facts based upon 20 years of latter experience in all the phases of intemperance. Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday evenings, although the weather was bitter cold the Doctor was greeted with large audiences, testifying by their presence their personal interest in behalf of temperance as advocated by this earnest and uncompromising foe to alcoholic stimulants." Dr. Reynolds will be at Charlevoix next week, Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday evenings.

Petoskey Clippings.

By far the largest cut load of mean factory wooden goods ever sent out of this market was shipped on the 9th, by Blood Bros. It consisted of 19,250 rolling pins, and constitutes the third carload shipped to one address within the past three months.

While the straits of Mackinaw are frozen over and teams are crossing on the ice, Little Traverse bay is as free of ice as in midsummer and not one is to be seen between the mainland and the Beavers. Should the mild weather continue through January, it is probable that we will have no ice this winter.

J. E. Walrond, of the firm of A. K. Smith & Co., had a couple of accidents happen to him in their Clarion mill yesterday. A 40 inch wooden bowl revolving at the rated 1,000 per minute, burst and Mr. Walrond was struck in the side and knee by the flying fragments, severely bruising him. Afterwards his hand was caught by the knife bar and severly jammed.

R. Coumble & Son, have discovered yet another method of preparing the fine fish of these northern waters for the market, and it promises to be a very important branch of their already large business. The new preparation is fish salad. Every one likes chicken salad, but the great amount of trouble necessary to its proper preparation makes it a rare dish even on well furnished tables. Fish salad is prepared by R. Coumble & Son, is fully equal to any of the best salads, and superior to most of them, and can be bought as needed for use in small quantities, for less than the cost of any choice salad to say nothing of the time and trouble spent in their preparation. Both the salad and their special fish will soon be standard goods in all stocked family groceries especially in the larger towns and cities.

Norwood.

Business is almost at a stand still, on account of the weather.

Monday the wind changed to the south and drove most of the ice out of the bay.

Rev. Mr. Howe has discontinued his meetings here on account of the weather and sickness in his family.

One of G. H. VanDelle children has been very sick, but is better now.

The boys had a very good time at the dance here last Friday night. Several couples were here from Charlevoix. There will be another dance in two weeks.

D. R. Bennett, one of our merchants, has gone on a visit to his old home in the eastern part of Ohio.

Frank Richardson, Bennett's clerk, has to stir around to keep himself warm.

M. E Church.

Services next Sunday morning. Subject, "The opinion of a great military man of the benefit of family religion."

The Sunday school is equipping itself with some pamphlets for future work. Let each member be in place at next Sunday's session.

Song service at 6 o'clock. Preaching at 6:30—subject, A Glimpse of Two Characters, Lazarus and Dives.

The members of the M. E. choir are requested to meet at the church next Saturday evening at 7:30 sharp.

THE LATEST SENSATION.

We now have on hand a choice lot of fresh roll butter, which is selling rapidly.

A choice lot of cream cheese,—very fine, and at bottom prices.

Our ten at five pounds for $1.00 takes the cake.

Fresh and domestic dried fruits,—peaches, raspberries, cherries, etc.

Catsup, pickles, sauces, spices, etc., at greatly reduced rates.

Notes and News.

The Manistee iron furnace is again in full blast.

A strain country has ninety miles of water front in its lakes and rivers.

One million feet of logs is the job of a Traverse City man at East Jordan this winter.

The Enterprise predicts a large amount of building in East Jordan next summer.

D. E. Swan, alias Edington, who stole $20,000 from the St. Paul office of the Northern Pacific railroad and was subsequently captured at Saginaw Bay, Mich., pleaded guilty at St. Paul Wednesday.

The Express speaks of the "open harbor all the year round, the finest on the eastern shore" in one column, and in another item says "the barges at the piers are fully 100 feet high." This is like the 100 foot ladder Paddy fell from: it was 100 feet long but 2 feet high.—Frankfort Times.

The Marquette Mining Journal gives a tabular statement of the total number of gross tons of iron ore shipped from the Lake Superior mines each and every year from 1856 to 1884 inclusive. There are 83 mines and the shipments for 1884 reach 2,355,924 gross tons, worth $12,718,849. The total shipments for 31 years reach 22,954,243 gross tons.

The editorial correspondent of the Manistee Standard advises all who contemplate visiting New Orleans to position to wait until the last of February and then—give up the trip. As a specimen of cheap living he paid 15c for dinner of two soft boiled eggs and a cup of milk, but does not know how much reduction was made on account of his being an editor.

The election of Cleveland is not signed as a cause for the Elk Rapids Iron Co's paying cash for wood and logs, although three out of five voted for him. And knowing this to be fact, it is strange that Elk Rapids will republican when this company has some two or three hundred men to employ? But business men never are politics with their business.—Elk Rapids Progress.

"When the crops begin to move," says the lumber, "we shall have a revival." When the crops begin to move," says the manufacturer, "there will be a healthy resumption of logging the line." When the crops begin to move," echoes the jobber, "orders will multiply." When the crops begin to move" is a period for which the retailer sighs, "When the crops begin to move," chorusses the farmer, "we will go to town and get a new outfit, from the soles of our feet to the crowns of our heads." Meanwhile the manufacturer, lumber, jobber, dealer and farmer wait patiently, hopefully, for the silver lining so long obscured.

Four or five years ago Mr. Port of Inland, noticed a few cherry trees on his place, and as this timber spoiler may be thought he would make it up into fence rails, but changed his mind and didn't do it. This winter he has made those few trees into lumber, and a few days ago brought a load down to experiment on a market. The lumber was not selected at all, but it brought an average price of $22 per thousand feet, some of it considerably higher than this, some a little lower. Mr. Pratt has taken 10,000 feet from two acres of land. It will realize his $250 or $125 per acre. This is now by a little scattering timber that a few years ago he thought of cutting into fence rails. Look sharply to your timber. It will all be valuable some day perhaps very soon.—Herald.

"I laid the foundation of this large jobbing business," said a leading merchant, "by adopting and strictly adhering to the one price rule. I made my business for years to go all through the stock and make prices for each day, that were alike to all customers. I favored no customer at the expense of another. If one bought for cash and another on credit, the price was the same to each; but to the cash customer I gave a discount to which his money was justly entitled. I also made it a rule to fill orders strictly according to instructions, and to take no advantage of an absent customer. These rules are still followed and adhered to. A price is made for the goods by the piece or package, and there is no deviation. The case price and the piece price are fixed each day, and no change is made. The plan of buying fish of one and flesh of another is a poor one, and, in the long run, will not succeed. Honest, fair dealing with all is the only sure path to success."

Northern News.

The new Ann Arbor Episcopal Church costs $15,000.

Lumber now costs buyers a rood of the best stock at a million.

According to the Michigan Farmer, wheat will go lower yet.

Iron miners are sending into use in the million of cords of wood.

Sailing vessels at Ludington are cutting stove wood for lumber's sake.

It is possible now to walk across the straits on the ice, by both sled and water-in-sleds and boats.

Mr. and Mrs. Abbey and two eastern men who have their pockets full of "rocks" and back, passed back and forth from Ludington last week on their way to and from Mexico.

It is reported that the G. R. & I. R. R. Co. is doing finishing work on along the line of the road for a week or thereabouts, and that they will then suspend building a short road connecting with the company.

Keystone lumber improvements at Mackinaw City, cost us $4,000 yesterday, and some Vulcan, are not favored by engineer of steamer Vulcan, who has to pay a fine of $100 for the use of sound signal $1,000 to make a boat fast in Mackinaw, and that the importance of the matter would not justify such expenditure. It seemed in Petoskey they say the beauty will not justify the construction of the harbor, and at Cheboygan they say it would be much greater than the importance of the work.

The Best Tobacco Pipe.

The white earthen pipe, porous and permeable to liquids, is not fired, because it is a good absorber of absolutely the metallic pipe is put fast, because it allows all the noxious products formed during the consumption of the tobacco to reach the mouth of the smoker. The meerschaum, which immediately follows the clay pipe, deserves its place only on condition that it is not too old. If it is seasoned it is as bad as a wooden or porcelain pipe. The seasoning, of which poets have sung, may be full of charms to the amateur; to the hygienist it simply indicates that the pipe has lost its day, and is now saturated with noisome juice, and that it must be replaced by another one, or be passed through the fire to purify it, as is done in the celebrations of Holland. Every old pipe, browned with long use, leaves on the lips and tongue an acrid and strong-smelling liquid, which irritates the tissues and excites the mucous secretions. When it has reached this condition the finest meerschaum is no better than the meanest search-throat.—Popular Science Monthly.

FAITH.

With constant faith surpassing doubt
I stand and watch the tide go out—
That Will is strong, I know to you
I do not know, and yet I do.

Accountable I am the day
I sail out on guard and go away.
Will morning come the minutes now?
I do not know, and yet I do.

I realize sure that autumn bring
Will coolness—come with waking spring?
My will alone can answer these
I do not know, and yet I do.

We are—we have—one drop of life.
Hath Heaven a brighter life on high—
Is death the tide that leads thereto?
I do not know, and yet I do.

—Chicago Times.

THE SWAMP ANGEL.

BY WILL P. JOHNSON.

Harry Smith had had a standing invitation to visit an uncle—a farmer living near the Okaw River—and the spring of 18— he decided to make the long contemplated visit, get a much needed rest, do some hunting and fishing, and come back to town strong and brown, and ready for any amount of business. He was engaged in an office in the city at a nice salary, but his work kept him too closely confined, and so he decided on this trip, which was to last three months at any way.

A description of him, as he is somewhat identified with this story, will not be amiss. He is a well-proportioned young man of about twenty-eight years; is good looking, with a full dark eye, a heavy dark mustache shading his mouth, a well-cut chin betokening firmness. His general appearance is typical of the many live young business men to be found in our cities. This was his first visit to his uncle, Nathan Smith, so the country was strange to him. He was supplied with shooting apparatus, fishing rods, etc. When he got off the train at a country station, he found his cousins Jarvis and Lizzie waiting for him. The three were soon driving two-crowd, rapidly getting acquainted with each other. The distance to drive was ten miles. After having driven some miles on the road they came up with and passed a one-horse buggy containing two women, one an elderly, and one quite a young lady. The elder of them kept on in the road, turning neither to the right nor to the left, not looking at our friends as they drove past. The younger lady seemed not so indifferent, though she bestowed on them only one quick look, then turned her face away. In that one momentary look, however, she met Harry Smith's eyes, and a quick blush came over her face. He noticed in that short scrutiny that she had a wonderfully pretty face, but that her clothing looked shabby and altogether out of date; yet her beautiful face attracted him, and he eagerly inquired who she was.

"I believe her name is Scranton," said Jarvis. "They live down in the Okaw bottom. The old party is the Swamp Angel."

"The what?" queried Harry Smith.

"The Swamp Angel!" repeated Jarvis.

"What on earth is she called that for?" said Harry.

"Because she is so angelic," said Jarvis.

"Well, I think the younger one looks more angelic," said Harry.

"I will tell you how she got the name," said Lizzie. "She is such a cross old thing, won't associate with any one, nor ever has any visitors, and has just as little to do with other people as she can. So the boys dubbed her the Swamp Angel. She lives in the low lands along the Okaw River, on a farm that is nearly surrounded by swampy land."

"Well, is she a single woman? does she live all alone? and if so, who is the young lady?" asked Harry.

"What a lot of questions all in a breath!" exclaimed Lizzie. "Give me time enough and I will try to answer them. I see I thought," she continued, hesitatingly, "that you are more interested in the young lady than the old."

"I admit it," said Harry. "Now, go on; I am dying with curiosity."

"I thought only women were possessed of a dying curiosity," said Lizzie.

"We will say men are too, for the present, and to avoid discussing the subject," said Harry. "So proceed, fair cousin, and answer my questions."

"She claims to be a widow, and, excepting her cross, lives all alone and has for several years. She came from the East somewhere; she inherited the farm from a crusty old bachelor who improved it. He was a queer genius, and she is queer. The girl, she says, is her niece, and she tyrannizes over her, and doesn't furnish her decent clothes to go out in, and will not allow her to go anywhere besides. She rents her farm to people living in the neighborhood; keeps only a horse and cow; and comes in a great white one year to town, or to collect her rents, and the balance of the time she stays at home, apparently doing nothing. She is a lateful old thing or she would let her niece go out in society." She is perfectly able to do so, for the farm is large, and the rents make a good income, and—

"There, there, cousin mine, that will do. Don't attempt to say any more; you will exhaust yourself, and my curiosity is entirely satisfied. I am now ready to change the subject," said Harry.

"It is easier to start Lizzie to talking than it is to stop her," remarked Jarvis.

"Isn't that true of the sex?" softly inquired Harry.

"No, it isn't," snapped Lizzie.

It will be seen by this that the cousins were getting acquainted very rapidly.

The very next day after Harry's arrival he took his fishing rod, and walked down to the Okaw, then took eastward, up the stream, stopping here and there and dropping his line into the water. He succeeded toward night—having started on soon after dinner—in getting a very respectable string of fish, and so, quite well satisfied with his sport, started for his uncle's. He concluded the quickest and nearest way would be to leave the timber with which the river was lined, get on into the cultivated land, and cut across the fields. He soon came out into an opening, and climbing an extraordinarily high rail fence, he found himself in a broad meadow, with a few cattle feeding and lazily only a few yards off. The house was a rather large, square frame building, needing paint and repair, but withal, quite substantial looking. He came up through the barnyard to a gate opening into the house-yard, and as he was feeling thirsty, concluded he would go inside the yard to be old-fashioned well which he saw there and get a drink. As he opened the gate, a low, muffled growl greeted his ear, and an immense, brindle-looking dog rose up not more than twenty feet away. He hesitated a moment; then he saw a young lady standing near the house looking toward him. Thinking that, of course, she would call the dog off, he started in, when she cried out, excitedly:

"Don't come in! He will tear you to pieces!"

Somewhat he sprang back through the gate, and none too soon, for at the same instant the immense mastiff made the attempt, literally hurling his weight against the gate

Sweet Cider.

DEAR UNDER SIGNAL:—I am loth to speak on the use of "sweet cider" at all, because I have thought and still think that important question will be settled by the sensitive conscience and sterling common sense of our white ribbon women. But I see it has come to the front once more so hailed (sweet) cider, and On Duty thinks there are "ifs" to be observed. Now I can scarcely see where the "ifs" can come in this case, any more than they can in our use of the grape juice which our Christian sisters have learned to seal up so deftly against their use in celebrating the ceremony of the Sacrament. Possibly one stumblingblock is in calling one cider, and the other the juice of the grape. No one, it seems to me, can find any objection to our perfectly legitimate and conscientious use of the juice of the apple. And if we are to draw into our army that class which would make such valiant soldiers, the farmers' wives, we must apply common sense views to common sense, every day thing: That is, the jelly making, the apple butter, the vinegar, the mince pies, and such like, which the country folks must make, or see the product of valuable orchards go to waste.

Our pledge is against the use of any kind of cider as a beverage, and our teaching is plain and unequivocal always on that point; we have only the pledge and modify it for no one. Then, too, in our hygienic instruction we say partially fermented and partially decayed foods of all kinds are unfit for use, and give abundant and plain reasons for such advice. There would be the same reasons for not using fermented prune or plum juice that there is against our use of fermented apple juice, leaving the pledge out of considerations. Hence I have thought the enlightened judgment and awakened moral nature of the neighborhood of our land would adjust their customs and mode of living to the spirit of our pledge. I learned to dislike the very name of cider in my childhood, and feel today that its use in any form is violating the spirit of my pledge; but I would use the juice of the apple or any other fruit in my way my judgment and taste dictated, and feel in no way culpable, as "Consistent Temperance Woman" said.

These are a few things in which can be advanced to help straighten some crooked points.

LUCINDA H. COBB.

Temptone of Vengeance.

She was captured about nine months ago, in shallooee to-man, or tiger sent to India by Mr. Reuter for one of her kind. A tiger trick was found in the jungle leading to the reedy banks of a river. A pit about twenty feet deep was dug in the path and covered over with branches of trees and brushwood. The natives then constructed the nooses, and at night the tigress, going down to the water, crashed through the covering, and lay, partially stunned and wholly helpless at the bottom of the pit. She was allowed to lie there for a week. The mouth of the pit was again closed and for seven days she lived in darkness without food or water. Such treatment very often kills a tiger but it is the only known method of reducing them from the state of savage frenzy unconquering their capture to anything like submission.

When at last the coverings were again removed the lion untamed Fanny was found to be anything but subdued. She was, however, weak, and her furious bounds to reach the mouth of the pit were short at first, and grew shorter with every effort. Then the natives began to angle for her. It was hard and dangerous fishing, but slowly noose after noose was dropped around her body, her fore legs were drawn tightly to her sides, and she was pulled on at last firmly bound and powerless. Other cords were thrown around her, and with her feet in the air and her back down, she was lashed to bamboo poles, and carried by a score of men to the place of embarkation. She had very little life left in her when she was placed on board ship and dispatched to Germany.

When she landed in Europe, however, she had quite recovered, and Mr. Reiche, who is living in Germany, was delighted with her appearance. He gave her the name of Fanny, and secured her passage to America. She is worth perhaps $3,500.—N. Y. Sun.

The Florida Mosquito.

That there are localities and seasons where mosquitoes are of enormous size and ferocity and in great numbers, writes a Florida correspondent of The Chicago Tribune, is not to be denied. Away from the coast mosquito-bars are the exception, but I think that during a part of every summer people everywhere would promote their comfort if they provided their beds with them. It is a curious fact that the presence of mosquitoes in great numbers depends upon excessive droughts. In a normal condition of things, when the ponds remain full, the fish, in which the ponds abound, consume the "wigglers," and mosquitoes are only produced in such wet places as are destitute of fish. But when the ponds become—as they sometimes do—completely dried up, and are again filled by the rains before they are restocked with fish, the wigglers reappear, and mosquitoes are generated in countless millions. But the fish presently return from some unknown hiding-places (it is a mystery to which I have observed a parallel in Siskiyou county, California), and in a few weeks repopulate the ponds with young fish and the mosquitoes disappear. On the coast, while they are not so numerous as in the interior, they are more persistent, though scarcely rising to the proportions of a serious pest except during July, August and September. The draining—and sometimes this is a simple affair—of the neighboring sand-flats, where the tide and rains create brackish lagoons, tends greatly to mitigate them.

Sand-flies are just as bad, and no worse than in light sandy soils anywhere where dogs and swine are allowed to circulate in or close about the house. They are no worse than they are in a certain class of hotels on the sand-lots of San Francisco. The presence of flies to any considerable extent is a reproach to the personal habits of the inhabitants wherever found. Much the same may be said of bumble-flies—they accuse the farmer himself. But no house, whether in Florida, or elsewhere, ought to be without screens. There is a large rattlesnake, not exactly the same species as that of the west and north, and, away from the coast, the ground rattlesnake, and about sloughs and lagoons several varieties of the moccasin. It is said that the native Floridians never kill a non-poisonous snake, as there are several varieties of them which assist in making war on the poisonous kinds. If I were living in the country here, I should, as a measure of security, either keep shrubbery out of the yard, and vigorously employ a lawn-mower, or I should (like the native Californians) exclude all vegetation from the yard, and keep the ground beaten down smooth and hard. I have yet to see my first snake in Florida.

In the Land of Nods and Clay Pipes.

A man from the outside world of realities describes the life of Arkansas as follows: Long days of doing nothing beget little energy. Little food is needed, and less new clothing. In the fall and winter the crops are gathered and turned over to the merchant who holds the mortgage. To sum up the labor of years: I was on the place yesterday, and found an old double log house, so nearly rotted down that it is propped up all around; the windows were without glass, the door-frames were without doors, the children could pass out between the logs in any direction, the lady and a friend were sitting in the "gallery," a space between the two cabins, on splint chairs, contentedly "slipping" snuff, while the lord and master, in dirty, ragtimed clothes, sat under a tree doing nothing, but looking happy as the day is long. Fences rotted down, and lean pigs with "pokes" on them, two sorry-looking horses trying to pick a living from the short grass, and little children, half a dozen or more, with but a single garment on, were listlessly playing in the shade. The lands, originally poor, with but two or three inches of soil on the prairies, were worn out and abandoned.

A new version of the Red Billing-Hood story comes from Surrewbury, Quebec. Before starting into the woods to work for Le Baron, of that place, told his wife to send their little daughter with his dinner. He waited until 3 o'clock, but as no dinner arrived he retraced his steps homeward. He had not gone far when he noticed a monstrous bear lustily engaged eating something. He watched its movements for a moment and fired his rifle at it and succeeded in killing the animal, little thinking of the terrible sight that was to be revealed to him. There lay his little daughter, disfigured a man beyond recognition, binding in her hand the one which contained her father's dinner.

The best cocoanuts come from Central and South America. They are not picked nor shaken from the trees, but when ripe fall of themselves. From 10 to 20 per cent are lost in transportation. Those partly spoiled are made into cheap confectionery; the others are burned, shell and all, and ground up into what is called spice mixture, which is used to adulterate pepper, cinnamon, allspice, etc. There is thus but little loss or damage except to the conscience.

WASHINGTON.

Washington telegram: "In response to an appeal from the Oklahoma settlers for the protection of the Government President Arthur has authorized a removal of the stores for their expulsion from Indian Territory, and instructions have been conveyed to Col. Hatch, in command of the United States troops, to drive the intruders out by force or arms if moral suasion does not prevail. Gen. Sheridan has received instructions to send more troops to Col. Hatch to assume the business if possible. Col. Hatch reports that the troops and the settlers are pretty far to close together that it is necessary to determine upon some action shall be taken. The settlers camp at Stillwater has received reinforcements, and the guard are opposed defiant and determined upon resistance."

The following official instructions were, on the 21st of January, sent from the War Department to Gen. Augur, regarding the course to be pursued with the Oklahoma invaders:

Fort Leavenworth, Kan.

In accordance with instructions from the Secretary of War, the Department General directs that you be informed that the Government for the removal from Indian Territory of the intruders therein is now ordered. It is hoped that it may be done without conflict, but the responsibility for any bloodshed must rest upon those who do not accept the warning of the proclamation of the President, of June 18, 1883, and who attempt with arms to resist the troops ordered to compel their removal. In order that the mischievous influence of the leaders of the present intruders to incite conflict may be reduced as much as possible, the military force should be increased so that all intruders may see the hopelessness of resistance. The Lieutenant General, therefore, directs that you immediately reinforce Col. Hatch by the remaining companies of the Eighth Cavalry, and also send him reinforcements from the Tenth, Twenty-second and Twenty-third Infantry, until the force he now has on hand shall be increased by 300 additional men.

P. H. SHERIDAN, Lieutenant General.

The Legislature of Ohio has refused to pass in the old capital, as Washington is station of ex-Gov. William Allen.

The Postmaster General has sent the Chairman of the House Committee on Post-offices and Post Roads the draft of a bill providing for a reduction of postage on newspapers, matter, or newspapers mailed by publishers from 2 cents to 1 cent per pound, etc. As provided in the draft this rate shall not apply to the exportation of sample copies generally, although a publisher may twice a year circulate sample copies not to exceed in number the actual circulation of the paper at the date of mailing.

POLITICAL.

The Washington correspondent of the Chicago Tribune asserts that "Senator Cockrell is well known and well to be among anti-monopoly attacks made upon him or late to break him down in Gov. Cleveland's eyes. The burden of the attack against him has been that he is 'anti-Jackson' in his conservatism of the Gamble term—that he is not a democrat because he does not sing tunes exactly to the old State rights theories. Cockrell has been misunderstood because he opposed the Blair educational bill, and an extract from a speech made in the Senate a year or so ago by Mr. Vest, showing some with the Union on certain constitutional powers of the Government, has been used against him. The fact of the fact that Vest voted for a bill appropriating money to eradicate a cattle plague, though he had taken issue with Cockrell for holding that the General Government had the constitutional right to vote relief to citizens of a state under circumstances such distress which it was beyond the power of the State to relieve."

Tammany Hall is said to be completely shorn of its local power in politics, and it is not thought that the General Government will give Abe Hewitt's faction any recognition. Recent defeats have seriously crippled Tammany, and the County Democracy will enjoy the distraction, for a time at least, of being the recognized regular Democracy of the city of New York.

The Springer committee which has been investigating the caucus brought in an Chicago adjourned last week, subject to call, and reported to Washington.

St. John is out with another letter, in which he denies the importance cast upon him by certain members of the Republican party, and says that he is no longer considered by them as his withdrawal as a candidate. To this Editor Carlson replies that what St. John says is incredible, contradicts himself in contradiction, and shows that he is any dealt with quibbles and evasive the main issue.

The Democratic members of the Indiana Legislature, in caucus, nominated B. W. Voorhies for Senator (by acclamation), and recommended Joseph E. McDonald to the President-elect for a Cabinet position.

William M. Evarts was nominated by the Republican caucus at Albany for the New York Senatorship. Evarts received 41 votes. Morton 25, Depew 4.

It is reported that the agreement between England and Turkey regarding the occupation of Egypt provides that Turkish troops shall occupy Egypt with the exception of the ports of Alexandria, Damietta, Port Said, and Suez, which England will continue to occupy; that England shall maintain garrisons in the Red sea littoral and abandon Soudan to Turkey; and that Tewfik Pasha, Khedive of Egypt, shall be deposed, the Sultan to appoint in his stead a Pasha who does not belong to the family of Mehemet Ali.

At Chicago special reports that "the special Grand Jury in Cook County has voted to hold 28 judges of election in that city for making false returns of the vote on the police appropriation. It was also determined to indict the Board of Canvassers—County Clerk Ryan and Justices Reeves and Scully—for not making a true canvass of the votes as shown on the poll books and tally-sheets. The recount of the ballots shows that the police appropriation was beaten by 1,200 votes, and that it only seven out of 171 precincts did the judges make correct returns. Indictments will not come than for at least a week. The constitutional amendment, county bonds, and the police and Sinn-House appropriations."

H. Lee Iddings received yesterday from M. J. Stockman, now in Florida, a box of very fine large sweet oranges, and the printer was remembered handsomely. Thanks.

The ladies of the W. C. T. U. and I. O. G. T. netted nearly $20 out of their supper and social at the Bridge Street house Saturday evening, besides having a very enjoyable time.

Dr. H. A. Reynolds was snowbound at Northport and failed to reach Charlevoix on Wednesday, but hopes to arrive by Friday, when the services will continue three days from his arrival.

G. W. Jefferies is now prepared with new tools, etc., to meet the wants of all old and new customers, and especially invites the people to call and see him in his new building A good stock of meat on hand.

A bill has been introduced in the Legislature to protect boat livery men making it possible to punish persons for hiring a boat, and then running away with it, or leaving it at where it will be damaged. Hitherto there has been no protection in this respect for persons who rented boats.

The stages running between Charlevoix and Petoskey are said to be models. They are real inclosed street cars—not Detroit street cars, but comfortable coaches heated by charcoal stoves, in which a man can take off his mittens and overcoat and read his paper as easily as at his own fireside.—[Detroit Free Press.

Alden Chamberlin whose arrest we mentioned two weeks ago, was examined last week and bound over for trial in the U. S. Court at Grand Rapids March 3d. The accusation is based on the carrying by the tug Wright last fall the family and goods of a gentleman wishing to remove from Beaver Island to Cross Village, which it is claimed was done by the master of the boat purely as a matter of accommodation, and without the knowledge of Mr. Chamberlin.

M. E. Church.

The extra meetings continue with unvarying interest. Great good is resulting from the labors. The Sunday school reports good work last Sunday; 112 present, with two new scholars. Preaching next Sunday morning and evening.

From Beaver Island.

On the 16th ult. we received our last mail, carried by Capt. Roddy, of the Schr. Tom Paine, from Harbor Springs. He had a hard time in crossing, sailing through large fields of ice, but finally reach Mr. Dormer's dock at 1 p. m. Mr. Lindstrom, the light-keeper, kept the light burning, until after Capt. Roddy's arrival.

The Schr. Hart, from Northport, bound for lake Erie, reached our harbor on Dec. 26th. She was loaded with provisions, etc. It took several of our men two days to get her up to the dock.

The Schr. C. J. Wells, that went ashore last fall on Whiskey Island reef, has gone to pieces. All the lumber drifted away, and the islanders did not get any.

So far the winter is a poor one for all concerned. There are several parties cutting ties and posts, and probably eight or ten cargoes will be got out this winter. The fishermen have not set any nets, but intend to if the ice makes.

We are generally healthy. No sickness at present, and only one death (John P. Gallagher, of consumption) since the close of navigation.

John Gallup is wintering on the island, and is now making fish-barrels at the rate of 40 a week, resting on Saturdays and Sundays. He intends to visit Charlevoix this winter.

M. F. O'Donnell teaches the school in Chandler township for three months. His roll contains 40 names, with more to come.

The inevitable tax gatherer is making his rounds, asking for five per cent on our capital, to contribute to the general fund of the town. This is not much, is it? But it is easily accounted for. Last year and the year before Ingersoll was sold by two or more persons who did not pay the license or give a bond. If this license was paid it would save the tax payers at least $1,200. Our new county officers are going to look into this matter, and insist on licensed saloons or none at all. The following are the principal officers:

Judge of Probate, James Dunlevy.
Sheriff, John Connolly.
Clerk and Register, John Dunlevy.
Treasurer, Owen O'Donnell.
Prosecuting Attorney, Benj. T. Halstead.
Surveyor, Fred Butts.

The mail goes in a small boat manned by Paul LaBlanc and Wm. Gibson, who will carry our mails for the winter.

Newspaper Notes.

The Manistee Advocate comes to hand as a five column folio semi-weekly, under the management of O'Malley Bros.

The Boyne Statesman made several noticeable improvements last week, increasing the quantity of reading matter and appearance of make-up very much.

The Big Rapids Current and Mecosboro Herald have discarded their ready-print insides, and are now purely local papers printed all at home at a reduced price.

The New York World is now taking the lead over the Sun in the point of circulation, which resulted from the attitude the latter paper assumed during the presidential campaign. Hundreds of Democrats in this state have become more Worldly inclined. The Sun helped the Republican party, and now Democrats are willing it should help itself.

One of the choicest, most compact little annuals we have seen in a long time is just received from the office of the Chicago Daily News. In addition to the usual features of a historical almanac, it gives a statement of the growth of the Daily News, growth of Chicago, political platforms of 1884, complete vote on president by counties population of states, state and territorial governments, congress, and a mass of other matter of value to people generally. There is also a well written illustrated article description of a visit to the Daily News office, written by Mrs. Clara Doty Bates. It is printed on heavy calendered book paper, and sold for the low price of ten cents per copy.

The February number of the Cottage Hearth is at hand. The frontispiece, entitled "The Best Valentine," shows a young, pretty, and manly girl in cloak and furs, making her way through a fierce snow storm with a basket on her arm. Mrs. Diaz tells a new "Hearth and Home Story" in her old-fashioned way, which inside her "William Henry" books so popular. A poem, on the "The Loss of Faith" is contributed by Hezekiah Butterworth. The leading article of the number is an editorial sketch of the life and work of Millet, the French painter, accompanied by seven drawings from his paintings, including a portrait of the artist himself "A Drive through Sacs," "A Yankee Newsboy of the War," and "Snow California Birds" are among the shorter stories and articles. The domestic departments of the magazine are well sustained, containing a large amount of original matter. The Cottage Hearth and the Journal one year for $2.00.

Political Paragraphs.

The enormous wealth of Jay Gould and Wm. H. Vanderbilt will appear to be average mind when it realizes the fact, as stated by Senator Van Wyck, that Gould's wealth was greater than the assessed property real and personal of Kansas and Nebraska, and that Vanderbilt could buy both states and have $40,000,000 left.

"A gratifying example is furnished by Lieutenant Gov. Hutton, who as president of the senate in appointing his committees made politics a secondary matter and fitness for the place the first requisite. Fusion senators are chairmen of some of the most important committees, and a number of committees are constituted with a majority against the republicans. The dissimilarity between the officers of the two houses shows the difference between a man and a partisan."—[Harbor Springs Independent.

Postmaster General Hatton has sent to the Chairman of the House Committee on Postoffices and Post Roads a draft of a bill providing for a reduction of postage on second class matter, or newspapers mailed by publishers, from two cents to one cent per pound. It is provided in the draft that this rate shall not apply to the circulation of sample copies gratuitously, although the publisher may twice a year circulate sample copies not to exceed in number the actual circulation of the paper at the date of mailing.

Representative Hampton is stirring up the legislative animals good. When the committees were formed he requested a place on the committee on elections, but as he was known to be sharp and aggressive, and opposed to Republicans holding seats in violation of the Constitution, as Speaker Clark himself, and several other members were doing, his request was refused. He then got one of the members of the committee to exchange places with him, but again the Republican speaker violated all rules of precedent and refused to grant the request.—[Chelsea gan Democrat.

The People Pay for the Passes.

The people of Michigan made a great mistake last fall when they voted down the amendment relating to salaries and railroad passes for members. Granting that the fact that the members receive favors from the railroads makes no difference with their course upon matters wherein railroads are interested (but railroad companies are not apt to grant favors without expecting favors in return) and still it must be seen that the system is an evil which should be remedied at once. The members receive such small pay that they can not afford to drop their business at home, and they feel that they must have favors in part compensation for their services. Having passes in their pockets, they can run home cheaper than they can stay at Lansing, and their pay goes on all the same. This induces members to secure frequent leaves of absence, and gives rise to frequent and long adjournments, every day of which costs the people of the State nearly a thousand dollars, just as though business was progressing.

The members should receive a fair salary, to the session long or short, and the most stringent provisions should be adopted against the use of railroad passes. Then if the legislature fooled away any time it would be their own, and not at the expense of the people.—[Harbor Spring Independent.

The Traverse City Asylum.

The Board of Commissioners of the Northern Asylum for the Insane at Traverse City met at the Russell House Detroit, at 10 o'clock last Wednesday, to open bids for putting heating and power boilers in the asylum. All the members were in attendance. The boilers for heating will be two in number, each 26 feet 4 inches long and 8 feet internal diameter, constructed throughout of Siemens-Martin open hearth, homogeneous steel. "Black Diamond" or other approved steel will be used in their manufacture. The fire boxes throughout are to be made of the best fire box plates; all other sheets of boiler plate. Each sheet must be stamped and stand 60,000 pounds tensil strain and show a reduction of area not less than 50 per cent. Each boiler will have two furnaces in the shell, divided by a water space. There will also be two power boilers, each 6 ft. diameter and 16 ft. long, having a front smoke extension of 1 ft. 4 in. and a horizontal dome 6 ft. long and 3 ft. diameter, connected to the boiler with two 12 in. nozzles.

On Thursday the contract was awarded to the Lansing Iron & Engine Works at $6,850.

Health Without Medicine.

"The wonderful sanitary influence of Northwestern Michigan are becoming well known to all America and 'the rest of mankind.' No malaria, hay fever, neuralgia or brain weakness; no sick headache, dyspepsia or general debility affects the people. The brain and nerves are calmed and the muscles and vital organs braced—exactly the reverse of what happens to the average residents of our large towns. The winters are long, but bring deep snows and a uniform temperature, so as to insure the highest degree of bodily vigor. The summers are not oppressively warm, and the autumns are fascinating. The soil after being cleared, is easily worked and productive, a crop of 30 or 40 bushels of wheat per acre being quite common; and for raising berries and winter fruit, there is no better clime on earth. Water is plentiful and pure, and the lakes and streams are the homes of the choicest fish. Railroads now traverse the region, and during the summer season the prows of lordly steamers cut the glittering waters between all important points. It is no wonder that a marvelous growth has set in, and that southern Michigan is looking wistfully and emigrating actively, 'up north.'"—[Lansing Republican.

Historical Society.

Society gathered at the parlors of Mr. and Mrs. Amos Fox, and enjoyed the evening highly. Although very cold, there were a great many present. The following program was attentively listened to: Instrumental solo by Miss Cochran. Paper by R. W. Kano which was considered instructive. A. T. Washburn, vocal solo (very fine). Select reading, F. A. Smith. Recitation, Mrs. Carleton, and very nicely delivered. Instrumental duet, Mrs. O. D. Wood and Mrs. F. A. Smith. Intermission of ten minutes. Afterward Mrs. Carleton delivered very ably a recitation on "Mrs. Maloney on the Chinese Question." After disposing with the regular order of business, the society adjourned, and all enjoyed an after "sociable." Altogether it made as pleasant a meeting as has been held this year.

On Tuesday evening next the society will meet with Mr. and Mrs. D. C. Loveday, February 3d.

Donation Supper.

At the residence of James O'Brian, in Norwood township, occurred last Friday night, one of those pleasant occasions which go far toward making up the memorable events of our long winters. Rev. Mr. Van Auken, of the Congregational Church here, makes regular appointments for services in the Hilton school house, and to partly compensate him, a supper was provided by the ladies of that vicinity, and invitations generally extended to the people all the way from Charlevoix to Norwood, who attended in liberal numbers. Seventy-two tickets were sold, the excellent supper "well cared for," and the balance of the evening devoted to a social time generally. We understand that another similar entertainment is contemplated, and will be provided for in the near future.

Birthday Surprise.

On Friday evening last, at about 9 o'clock, as Miss Addie Pemble returned home from church, she was surprised to find about twenty of her friends there, waiting to receive her. The occasion was an enjoyable one. A beautiful repast was served, and all felt that "it was good to be there." The surprise was complete, and much credit is due to Mr. Weyhorn and his friends for its success.

Extensive Fishing Business.

Arrangements are being made by S. H. Davis & Co., of Detroit, to engage extensively in fishing next summer, making their shipments from Charlevoix. It is said they will employ three large fish tugs, besides buying the catch of local fishermen, and will make arrangements with steamers from Detroit to touch here so as to make direct shipments to the east and south. They have already leased a lot of Greening & Geisler for an ice house (on the old planing mill site), and have made arrangements for boarding twenty tug men and fishermen who will arrive at the opening of navigation.

If this firm succeeds here, it is no doubt the beginning of a business which will give Charlevoix a national reputation, for if the catch is abundant, means of preserving will naturally be employed, and gradually become permanent features of the business.

Real Estate Transfers.

Here is an item from the Canby correspondent of the Petoskey Democrat, regarding game laws: Quite a number of deer men roam the woods as it is becoming safe for them to come out of the swamps. The best game law for this part of the country would be one which would make all outsiders wholesale live in the country pay a license of five dollars per month for the privilege of hunting deer. The money could be added to the poor fund of the county.

"Some idea of the immense sum power of surface mine is scattered from the following truthful incidents in some time with the Passage for last Tuesday night: Mr. Austin, the watchful clerk at the Owl stand, while waiting the arrival of the bogging night train from the north, was counting his silver by the office fire. Hearing the first strokes of the alarm, he thought the noise was caused by the scattering of a mill in his hand upon the stove fender. Will Snyder, sleeping at Harwood's house one block away, dreamed he was not sleighriding with the girls while the bringle sweetly tinkled."—[Petoskey Herald.

A precious carpet has been destroyed in San Francisco. It had covered the floor of one of the rooms in the Mint, and had been used for five years. Ten dust of the precious metal lost in the coinage had during that period daily fallen upon it, and when it was taken up the authorities had it cut in small pieces and burned in pans. The ashes were subjected to the process employed with mining dust, and they realized $2,500. Thus the carpet, after years of wear, was more precious than when it was new.

Alden's Juvenile Gem.

A large extra sheet containing a number of fine illustrations accompanies number two of Alden's Juvenile Gem. Grown folks as well as young folks will find a good deal of amusement as well as wisdom in the "Pickles" which the pictures exceedingly amuse, as did the contents of the paper generally. The large beautiful type in which the paper is printed and its form and size of page make the whole appearance delightful to the eye. There is abundant variety of story, anecdote, history, facts in narrative and science, biography, and poetry, and all so interesting and healthful in tone that parents and teachers will give the paper hearty welcome into home and schools. WATCHING THE COLTS.

Genoa: I choose to keep my seat,
Nor pitch the giddy honors' wild,
Lest you do and laugh, my girl,
Nor ask me why I fled it need,
So my old age to watch your glee—
A boy, dare boast to Alcely?

And though fell will I know I scorn
Quite clad, I'm not in scorn like this,
Yet can I imagine how man bliss
Lyon your free joy and—scorn,
As over the fence I see Sitting by,
Jack I, too, dwelt in Arcady.

For, once heard, in your merry eyes
A spirit of a more tender mood dance,
And with the same fatalist books of rose
Lyon your mother's merry—one,
Jack I, too, dwelt in Arcady.
My father had boasted manhood back

And as with fear—dimmed eyes I cast
On your sweet form my young soul—chance—
I think your mother used to dance
Just so this one, in that—half gone,
Jack I, too, dwelt in Arcady.

And in the midst of laughing notes
I seem to hear her voice ring
That long years hushed, she many a spring,
Jack I, too, dwelt in Arcady
Jack I, too, dwelt in Arcady
I used to hear in—early.

And yonder south—may, do not blush;
Yon is where I dwelt in Arcady
And hark yr, mind! I was not plain
Jack I, too, dwelt in Arcady
He—cause I'm a—wary
You two we dwell in Arcady.

HERR MUNSON'S VIOLIN.

BY MRS. E. N. KEE.

CHAPTER I.

The last sweet echo of a violin floated out upon the still, frosty air—sad, solemn world.

It was midnight. Crowds of people were assembled in the little gothic church of Gretchen, to watch the death of the old year and the birth of the new. The bells tolled; and as the last echo overwhelmed and drowned the air like faint, sweet melody of the violin again was heard, like the wailings of a departing soul.

The sad strains of the violin had scarcely died away when the thinking of an Italian harp was heard by the passing listener, accompanied by a sweet, dulcet voice.

The figure of a man approached the tenement and stood for a moment as though paralyzed. How familiar the strains. What fond memories were stirred in the heart of the bronzed, bearded stranger, occasioned by the unconscious musician.

"A fine voice, that!" exclaimed one of the watchers, pausing a moment, admiringly. "And, by my faith, it is a master hand now sweeps the lyre. Hah, my friend, only some common scrolling musicians—a German Herr and his pretty and clever little Frauleen. That is all!" and he hurried away, leaving the stranger eagerly awaiting a repetition of the heavenly strains and sarpiha voice of the little ill-appreciated performer and—lyre.

At length another stanza came. "Eh, the dear old German words—the lowly and national air of the Fatherland."

The notes of the violin again fell on his attentive senses—sweet, heart-rending dirge; and, waiting to hear no more, he deeply affected stranger sprang up two steps at a time of the old, dilapidated staircase, and knocked with decency into a dimly lighted but comfortable apartment, where dwelt the subject of our story.

Herr Munson half reclined on a low settee, his aged eyes fixed lovingly upon the to him almost human friend which he supported between his knee and chin, and, passing his trained fingers over the strings, he was about to repeat the last two lines of the dearly loved and well remembered old German song, when the stranger appeared upon the threshold.

He paused, astonished.

In a low chair, dreamily gazing into the golden mists of the future, was the fairest being that he had ever beheld. Deep blue eyes, large and lustrous, sipping golden hair, sweeping in shimmering splendor the ends of the well-worn rockers, and lovingly clustering around the low, pure brow of the beautiful, unconscious young dreamer; cheeks of a delicate sea-shell pink, delicately rounded; a sweet, sensitive mouth, incapable of anything akin to deceit; a nature trustful and loving, innocent of guile. Such was fair Gretchen Munson, the fair lily of Havaria, the undoubted queen of her old Dating father's heart.

Not the least sign of recognition crossed the startled face of the wondering lost as he arose to welcome his informal guest. He bade him welcome, pushing forward the only remaining seat, and with native dignity befitting the custom of his country, offered a pipe of huge dimensions, together with a well-filled tobacco pouch to the stranger.

It was not long ere the Herr became totally oblivious to all present surroundings and circumstances, in discussing events in the far-away land of his most blissful dreams, near the towing Isle; and over which he found the stranger as enthusiastic and as equally familiar with as himself or his idolized Gretchen could be.

"But why not return to the Fatherland, Herr Munson," questioned the stranger, "since you do not like America, and are pining for old faces and familiar scenes?"

"The scarcity of funds, to speak candidly, alone prevents my Gretchen and myself from immediately embarking." Then, seemingly aware of some lack in hospitality, he arose and said:

"Dry pardon, sir, but this is my Gretchen—my only child! My dear, our friend—our titled countryman—Monsieur Zanders." After which somewhat lengthy and airy introduction he resumed his seat.

"You wish to know why I tarry in this, to me, unsongenial country. As I have told you, Monsieur, it is lack of funds. And I may tell you candidly, my friend, this night not only sees the last of the old year, but the last of our freedom and happiness, on earth. Do you know," he said, while his bright gray eyes kindled, and his voice grew husky with emotion, "to morrow morn I am to lose my all. The roof which kindly shelters us from this night's cold blasts, and which has sheltered me for years, is to pass into the hands of strangers. But, oh! the worst blow of all. Monsieur they will tear from me this long-tried friend—friend, and sympathizer—to be roughly handled by strangers," he said, as he patted the instrument lovingly, while a mist gathered in his eyes.

"But, papa, you will not be all alone! You will have your Gretchen with you, to love and care for you as long as life shall last" exclaimed the beautiful, impulsive creature, hastily crossing to his side, and winding her arms affectionately around the neck of her aged parent.

"Yes, God bless you, my darling! and a treasure you are to the old man. But, for your own sake, pet, I could wish the good Lord had ordained it otherwise. We are too fine tender a bud to transplant to such rude surroundings, not counting the disgrace. Do you know, Fritz, I fancy that we have all not be many after my entrance at the Almshouse, and bitter days will, undoubtedly, come to you, my pet, after I am gone." And he stroked lovingly the long, golden curls.

CHAPTER II.

A FRIEND IN NEED IS A FRIEND INDEED.

Bless the gentry, he is sleeping!
Close your curious lash lain upon
Lest he see me the lowest form princing!
Ah! Gretchen, I'm scared to—

"Drive steady, Jim; the old man has fainted, I guess." The thought of the poor, lovely creature fainting that fear.

"Let the old fiddle stay under his head! We've got plenty to can lift him out and carry him in easy enough; he is only skin and bone, you know. Get up there, Charlie," saying which, the rough but kind-hearted driver turned his head from his companion, and maintained a rigid silence during the remainder of the drive.

Gretchen sat like a beautiful statue, throughout the journey, except when once she stopped to draw more closely the muffler around the neck of her unconscious father, who had sunk from the effects of great fatigue in one of the sleigh, his head unconsciously pillowed upon the much-loved instrument.

"Here we are!" called out the voice of the driver, as he drew rein before a dilapidated gate leading to a long, low-roofed building, and holding known for leagues around as the Insane Asylum and County Alms-house combined.

Gretchen arose in the sent with a lace of marble whiteness and firmly set lips, calming all self-possession.

"Please be careful when you raise him," she said, designating the form in the bottom of the sleigh.

"Yes, Miss! We will try to be as gentle as a woman could be with him. But I'm afraid it will go hard with him when he comes to," said the driver, feelingly.

"I have not been to see him, but they told me that he was very weak," she said, a frightened look leaping into her blue orbs.

"Do not be alarmed! I can plead—but confidence in my housekeeper's word. We will allow him to rest a night undisturbed, for I have a surprise for him in the morning."

"It is nothing short of surprise everywhere to me to-night. Monsieur," Gretchen exclaimed, as she arose to partake of the dainty repast which a servant had just brought in for her.

"How exceeding kind of you," she said, gratefully.

"I beg you do not speak of it! It is in itself but a trifle. And I assure you, Miss Munson, I enjoy my wealth much more when I share it with a fellow-creature, than I should to live the life of a hermit, and die a miserable miser."

CHAPTER III.

"But, sir, I do not understand. Why is it that a mere stranger evinces so much interest in our welfare as to call on us when just on the verge of the above trials, and convey us to a home of such palatial grandeur, and now prevails upon us to remain with him, at his expense, permanently. I must understand the motive, sir, I assure you." Herr Munson said, upon the morning after his conversation to Honeycastle Lodge.

"Herr Munson," began the benefactor, earnestly, "do you forget the circumstances of twenty years ago, which took place at your father's house, of a poor, friendless boy of 18 years or thereabout, who sought shelter and food? Your father, bless his kind heart, sir, gave him a home, and treated him kindly by works of art, treasures of literature, and comfortable furniture, tile furniture, his windows on the ground floor looking out on the Berlin Park, where the aristocracy of the city met in grand fashion and rank of the German capital passed and repassed, did not turn a deaf ear to the boy's petition for aid, but, instead, fed and clothed him, and assisted him in obtaining employment which proved ample support for him and his aged mother, now in heaven, Herr Munson. I am more indebted to you, through your family, than you can ever be to me; for that boy now from the days of your father's kind, good fortune and prosperity to that day of twenty years ago."

Grateful tears had sprung to his eyes while speaking, and both Gretchen and her father wept in mutual sympathy with the narrator.

Warm hands clasped each other, while each heart, for a time, was too full for utterance.

"Let it be very good," Herr Munson at length remarked, while a sad, longing look upon his gray eyes. "Yes, God is very good."

"I have a New Year's present to confer upon you, Herr, if you will but accept it," William Zanders exclaimed, as he arose and passed hastily into an adjoining room. He soon returned, bearing with him something securely wrapped in paper, and passed it to Herr Munson.

"I have no New Year's present to confer upon you, Herr, if you will but accept it," William Zanders exclaimed, as he arose and passed hastily into an adjoining room. He soon returned, bearing with him something securely wrapped in paper, and passed it to Herr Munson.

I must understand the motive, sir, I assure you." Herr Munson said, upon the morning after his conversation to Honeycastle Lodge.

"Herr Munson," began the benefactor, earnestly, "do you forget the circumstances of twenty years ago, which took place at your father's house, of a poor, friendless boy of 18 years or thereabout, who sought shelter and food? Your father, bless his kind heart, sir, gave him a home, and treated him kindly by works of art, treasures of literature, and comfortable furniture, tile furniture, his windows on the ground floor looking out on the Berlin Park, where the aristocracy of the city met in grand fashion and rank of the German capital passed and repassed, did not turn a deaf ear to the boy's petition for aid, but, instead, fed and clothed him, and assisted him in obtaining employment which proved ample support for him and his aged mother, now in heaven, Herr Munson. I am more indebted to you, through your family, than you can ever be to me; for that boy now from the days of your father's kind, good fortune and prosperity to that day of twenty years ago."

Grateful tears had sprung to his eyes while speaking, and both Gretchen and her father wept in mutual sympathy with the narrator.

Warm hands clasped each other, while each heart, for a time, was too full for utterance.

"Let it be very good," Herr Munson at length remarked, while a sad, longing look upon his gray eyes. "Yes, God is very good."

"I have a New Year's present to confer upon you, Herr, if you will but accept it," William Zanders exclaimed, as he arose and passed hastily into an adjoining room. He soon returned, bearing with him something securely wrapped in paper, and passed it to Herr Munson.

[FAC-SIMILE OF TYPE-WRITER LETTER.]

TO THE PUBLIC, GREETING:

Boards of Health are now everywhere correcting the faults of sewerage and advising the people how to prevent future epidemics.

But other precautions are necessary, without which no amount of Sanitation can avail. Dr. Koch says that cholera has but little chance among those who keep the digestive organs and the liver, skin and kidneys (the sewers of the body) in healthful operation.

Warner's SAFE Remedies are the best scientific Curatives and Preventives, and we cannot too much emphasize the importance of using them now, as a safeguard against any future scourge.

Much of the common ailments are caused, not primarily by bad blood, but by IMPAIRED LIVER AND KIDNEYS. This results in blood corruption and injury to the entire system. Remove this impaired action, and most ordinary ailments will disappear. Other practitioners have held that extreme liver and kidney disorders are incurable. We, however, by the severest tests, have unanswerably proved the contrary. Please note:

FIRST.—WE DO NOT CURE EVERY KNOWN DISEASE FROM ONE BOTTLE. Warner's Safe Remedies are specifies, which have been successively put upon the market ONLY IN OBEDIENCE TO STRONG PUBLIC DEMAND. These remedies are: Warner's SAFE Cure, for kidney, liver, bladder and blood disorders, General debility, Impotency, gravel, female irregularities; Warner's Safe Diabetes Cure, for Diabetes—the only known specific; Warner's Safe Rheumatic Cure for Rheumatism, Neuralgia; Warner's Safe Pills for constipation, diarrhoea, biliousness; Warner's Safe Nervine for nervous disorders; Warner's Safe Throatine for Asthma, catarrh; Warner's Tippecanoe for all stomach derangements.

SECOND.—Warner's Safe Remedies, spite of all opposition, have won the victory and are everywhere recognized as leading STANDARDS.

THIRD.—After six years of unequalled experience, we give these unqualified guarantees:

GUARANTEE I.—That Warner's Safe Remedies are pure, harmless, effective.

GUARANTEE II.—That the Testimonials used by us, so far as we know, are bona fide, with a forfeit of $5,000 for proof to the contrary.

GUARANTEE III.—That Warner's Safe Remedies are NOT MERELY TEMPORARY, BUT PERMANENT, IN THEIR CURATIVE EFFECTS AND WILL SUSTAIN EVERY CLAIM, IF USED SUFFICIENTLY AND PRECISELY AS DIRECTED.

FOURTH.—Special inquiry among hundreds of our oldest patients results in unequivocal testimony that the cures wrought six, five, four and three years ago, were PERMANENT. And most of these patients were pronounced INCURABLE when they began Warner's Safe Remedies. Read a few of Thousands of examples:

THE REV. ANDREW J. GRAHAM, (P.E.) Grand Island, Neb., in 1881 wrote: "Announced fatally sick with Bright's disease. He could get no relief from physicians. He then used Warner's Safe Cure. On July 7, 1884, he wrote from England, "All remaining symptoms disappeared. Have taken no medicine for nearly a year."

Rev. A. J. Graham.

CHAS. D. CRANDELL, Postmaster, Big Rapids, Mich., was sick for four or five years from a chronic disease. In 1881 he used a few bottles of Warner's Safe Cure, with satisfactory results. In 1884 he reported: "The benefit in my case were marked and permanent, have had no trouble since."

Chas. D. Crandell, P.M.

E. D. HOPKINS, Dodge's Corners, Wis., got so thoroughly filled with uric acid poison, as result of kidney disease, that he lost his mind; was confined in an asylum. In 1882 began Warner's Safe Cure, was marvelously restored, and Nov. 11, 1884, he reported that he "had not missed a meal in 3 months and was as strong as an ox."

E. D. Hopkins.

R. F. LARRABEE, Esq., 42 Chester Square, Boston, Mass., in 1879, was given up by several prominent Boston physicians as incurable from Bright's Disease. He took over two bottles of Warner's Safe Cure, in 1880-2, and Oct. 6, 1884, wrote that the "cure was as permanent as surprising."

R. F. Larrabee.

ELDER JAMES S. PRESCOTT, Box 262, Cleveland, Ohio, founder of North Union Shakers: In 1878 was pronounced incurably sick of chronic Bright's disease, by the best physicians. Then he resorted to Warner's Safe Cure. March 12, 1885, wrote: "Health never seemed better than 8 years ago." Oct. 18, 1884: "I am enjoying a very comfortable degree of health." He says also, "I am an enthusiast over Warner's Safe Cure." Also Kidney troubles.

James S. Prescott.

C. F. B. HASKELL, (formerly of Vernon, Vt.) now leading engineer on the R. C. R. and N. Railroad, Dakota, stated in 1883 that his wife was utterly prostrated with female difficulties and did not seem to be amenable to physicians' remedies. She could not sleep, trembled like a leaf, periodically lost her reason. They then began the use of Warner's Safe Cure. Writing in July, 1884, from Dakota, Mr. Haskell says: "My wife has never seen the slightest inclination to return of the female difficulties Warner's Safe Cure removed."

The Rise of a French Marshal.

Andoche Junot was a Burgundian by birth, born in 1771, and in his youth, after a preparatory schooling, he studied law, but never practiced. When he was 21 years of age he enlisted in the army as a volunteer; it was in the height of the Revolution, a few months previous to the execution of the King Louis XVI. In September, 1793, when Paris had become comparatively quiet under the rule of the Convention and his own section of the army, he asked, Napoleon Bonaparte, then scarcely known, signed the old Convention and his own section of the army. Junot raised his cap and bowed, upon which he was called out and conducted to the right of the line, where the musicians were; and here a large drum was set on end, paper, pen and ink furnished, and the youthful soldier was directed to write. He took the pen and dashed off the dispatch in a clear, round, handsome hand, and was just beginning to write the closing signature when a cannon ball—a few sixty-pound round shot—came up the earth close to his left foot, covering him and the drum-head with dirt. Without so much as the quiver of a finger, without a moment's hesitation, the writer gave the sand a flirt to throw off the gravel, and then finished the message, laughingly saying as he did so: "That dirt is rather too coarse for blotting sand; but it has done no damage." And he folded the message and directed it, after which he handed it up to his commander, who had been all the while narrowly watching him. "Young man," said Napoleon bluntly, "you are cool-headed and brave. What can I do for you?" "I know of nothing, General, unless you can cause those wretched epaulettes to be taken from my shoulders and a pair of silver ones put in their place." "Very well," replied the commander, in a pleasant nod. "You can rule?" "Anything that can be ridden by man, I think." "Then find a horse and bring this message to its destination. My orderly furnishes you. Bear the message and then report to me." On the following day Junot was made a lieutenant, and he was a captain at the end of the month, having, on account of his daring courage, won the sobriquet of "The Tempest." In the campaign of 1797 he was promoted to the rank of colonel, and in Egypt he was a brigadier-general. After this he became Governor of Paris, then lieutenant-general, then marshal; and in the end he made Duke of Abrantes.

Is It Really Consumption!

Many a case supposed to be radical lung disease is really one of liver complaint and indigestion, but, unless that diseased liver can be restored to healthy action, it will so clog the lungs with corrupting matter as to bring on their speedy decay, and then follows we have consumption, which is scrofula of the lungs, is its work form. Nothing can do more happily directed to remove this danger is the last thing in Dr. Pierce's "Golden Medical Discovery." By druggists.

Are You Going to New Orleans or Florida?

If so, you can go via the MONOT ROUTE to Louisville or Cincinnati, and see the Mammoth Cave, Nashville, Bloom Springs, Birmingham, Montgomery, Selma, and the Gulf coast for the same money that will take you by the circuitous route, and see no Mississippi scenery. We are confident you cannot resist the temptation of spending half the advantages that go generously with the MONOT ROUTE and its Southern connections.

Do you ever think of going South without visiting the Mammoth Cave, the great natural wonder of this continent, the mark has been written of this world-famous wonder, that it is impossible to say anything new in regard to it—it cannot be described; its caverns must be enjoyed, its darkness felt, its beauties seen, to be appreciated or realized. It is the greatest natural curiosity—Niagara not excepted—and its whose expectations are not satisfied by its marvelous avenues, domes and starry grottoes must either be a very dull or very hard to please. From Nashville to New Orleans 1 41 miles, 7 hours along the Gulf coast is about 3 hours, and the balance of the whole trip. In fair sight of the Gulf all the way, past Ocean Springs, Mississippi City, Pass Christian, Bay St. Louis and Beauvoir, the home of Jeff Davis.

When you decide to go South make up your mind to travel over the line that passes through the best country and gives you the best places to stop over. This is emphatically the Monot Route, in connection with the Louisville and Nashville and the Cincinnati Southern Railways. Pullman Palace Sleepers, Palace Coaches, double daily trains, Louisville, Cincinnati, Lenoxville, New Orleans and Florida. For full information, descriptive matter, address or call on E. B. "Parlor Lines."

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—In your issue of Dec. 25 there is an extract from Joseph Cook's lecture on "Lawlessness", regarding the drawing of parlor lines against women who belong to the families of liquor sellers. Now we all know that Joseph Cook's treatment of the temperance question is usually considered reasonable and just, but, notwithstanding, we beg leave to differ with him very materially regarding his "parlor lines." We would ask his authority for closing the doors of society against a wife because of some wrong her husband may do, or for shutting outside the daughter or mother of a man who is dealing in poison? Mr. Cook would have us suppose that the wife of every liquor seller is a soul and body partner in her husband's miserable business, which supposition is known by all sober-minded, observing people to be untrue. That there are wives who uphold and aid their husbands in the selling of liquor, is too sadly true, but it is just as true that there are many who would shed tears of joy could they persuade their husbands to forsake their liquor selling and give themselves to some honest toil, even though it only brought nickles instead of the ill-gotten dollars. Many a saloon-keeper's wife would prefer to step upon a bare floor provided by honest toil, rather than rest her feet upon Brussels tapestry purchased with money wrung from the hearts and homes of other wives. Many a rum-seller's wife is pure and Christian, and her prayers approximate just as near the throne of mercy as do those of other wives who are particularly careful about "parlor lines." And yet Mr. Cook is "not unwilling" that the lines be drawn against such as these. That there is a "right hand and a left," we admit, but we will not admit, that Joseph Cook, the ladies of Cleveland, or any other person, has a Christian right, or any other right, to say that the lines of society shall be drawn against "every woman belonging to the family of a liquor-seller." If a liquor-seller has a wife who is not in sympathy with his business, all the more does she need that help and encouragement which comes from companionship with those who are striving to overthrow the wrong and build up the right. She is a sister woman and has difficulties which you and I know nothing of. Baby faces may nestle upon her bosom, and her scalding tears drop upon their curly heads as she looks out into their dark future, with temptations at their very door. Draw the parlor lines against such if you can, but don't forget that in so doing you may draw the lines of a higher mansion against yourself.

Beatrice, Neb. MRS. A. HARDY.

Say, now, I seen a nigger put seven eggs in his mouth all at once," said Johnny Cinarle, as he came in from his supper. "Hump, that's nothing; your father put that hatcher shop and a horse and wagon into his," tartly replied Mrs. Cinarle. Whiskey was the rimination of the old man.

"An Over Production."

Under the above caption the Grand Traverse Herald discusses the demise of certain local newspapers, and the precarious existence and possible early suspension of others. Over production is assigned as a cause for much of the trouble of country newspapers in northern Michigan. We will suggest a cause of the over production. Usually a man who undertakes to publish a neutral local newspaper is looked upon by his editorial brethren and others as lacking something in his mental make up. He is accounted of little value to the craft, to his town, or to anyone, until he strikes out vitally as a party organ. The officials who have the distribution of public work give force to this sentiment by insisting that the papers must support the administration or be deprived of the work by competition. Papers are frequently started as party organs, and not to supply any demand for news. And when the parties are nearly equally divided, each must have an organ, though the actual business is not enough to support one decently. Party pride, reinforced by careful management and many self denials, frequently keep these papers running when the outlay is greater than the income. In some cases, too, where one paper has had the field alone, and has just begun to be well supported, their arrogance and bitter partisan assaults have compelled the starting of opposition papers, though the business of the town would not really warrant it.

Another mistake is the attempt, stimulated by the cheapness of "patent inside," to compete with city weeklies. When such weeklies as the Detroit Free Press and the Post, and hundreds of others from all over the country, can be bought for one dollar a year, giving four or five times the amount of state and general home and foreign news, miscellany, stories, etc., the home paper can possibly hope to, and when nearly every family takes one or more of these great weeklies anyway, it is folly for the country paper to undertake to compete.

If the country paper will confine itself to giving all the home news, and not assault the political or personal opponents of the editor, we imagine its success will be greater, and in many places competition will be avoided.

It is not many years since $200 a year was the standard price of weekly papers. With improved machinery, the city publisher can now produce a much larger paper for half the money, and when the country publisher whose machinery is none the same now refuses to compete, he is then denounced as a recluse, his subscriber holds up his city blanket sheet, makes a comparison of the surface covered, and says the difference is too great.—The price must come down.

Panicky times will continue until country publishers make their papers of special value to their own locality, refuse to compete with the city weekly, and demand prices sufficient to make their business profitable.

Political Paragraphs.

It is now hinted that William M. Evarts floated into the Senatorship upon a river of champagne.—[Utica Observer.

A number of Pittsburg nail factories and G. Hussey & Co.'s copper works at the same place have resumed. Lucy furnace, employing several hundred men, goes into operation next week.

The Baltimore Manufacturers' Record shows that since Jan. 1 enterprises that have resumed work have employed 100,000 men, while in addition a large number of miners have commenced work in Pennsylvania.

The political Waggins says: "About this time look out for conflagrations in public buildings in Washington City." A fire in the Navy and Treasury Departments between this and the fourth of March would doubtless carry consolation to a number of public functionaries.—[New York World.

Wm A. Berkey, a furniture manufacturer at Grand Rapids, is agitating a scheme to petition the president and congress to give to every man, woman, and child in the United States ten dollars in treasury notes, to help tide over this present hard times, and not that much more currency in circulation. If such a scheme will help times any we say amen. But we imagine the president and congress will do nothing of the kind. As Mr. Berkey advertises his scheme in the way of a nicely printed letter heading, and requests all interested in the scheme to send 25 cents to help pay the expense of agitating it, we are pretty sure he is the only man who will ever get any benefit from it.

Rev. W. H. Stuckmann, presiding elder of Grand Traverse district, has sold his house and lot in Newaygo to the editor of the Village paper, consideration $700.

The Price Propeller, the Detroit and Cleveland Steam Navigation Company will change the name of the steamer "City of Cleveland" to "City of Alpena." The former name will be given to the aluminum steamer which will be built next season.

The Harbor Springs Independent says: We were talking with a pioneer the other day, and he knows all about the petitioners referred to the early settlers of this county, and he expressed himself as well satisfied with his lot, considering the hard times and other drawbacks common inheritors. He said, "I haven't got very fine clothes, but I have enough and enough to keep my family and my stock, and boys that necessarily go to school to know how, and when it is stormy weather I can set by the fire with the knowledge of a good wood pile and enough to do me and that defiance to the elements. I am doing getting in shape to live, work, and an tight and I don't sell my place and move in town to work in the day like some of my neighbors did, and take care my family outside." We agree with him. Stick to the farm, and the farm will pay by-and-by.

English Synonyms.

The copiousness of the English tongue, as well as the difficulty of securing the ability to use its immense vocabulary correctly, is well exhibited in the following array of synonymous words, which, if not new, is yet a complete illustration of the nice distinctions even characteristic of some of our dailies. It is no wonder that we slip occasionally, even the wariest of us. A little girl was looking at the pictures of a number of ships, when she exclaimed: "See what a fleet of ships!" We were pressed her by saying that a fleet of ships is called a fleet, and that a flock of sheep is called a flock. And here we would add, for the benefit of the foreigner who is mastering the intricacies of our language in respect to nouns of multitude, that a flock of geese is called a flock, that a bevy of wolves is called a pack, and that a pack of thieves is called a gang, and that a gang of angels is called a host, and a host of porpoises is called a school, and a school of buffaloes is called a herd, and a herd of children is called a troop, and a troop of partridges is called a covey, and a covey of beauties is called a galaxy, and a galaxy of ruffians is called a horde, and a horde of rascals is called a heap, and a heap of oxen is called a drove, and a drove of blackguards is called a mob, and a mob of whales is called a school, and a school of worshippers is called a congregation, and a congregation of engineers is called a corps, and a corps of robbers is called a band, and a band of locusts is called a swarm, and a swarm of people is called a crowd, and a crowd of gentlemen is called the elite, and the elite of the city's thieves and rascals is called the roughs.—San Francisco News Letter.

The Keystone of a Great Tower Laid.

Three hundred people, with upturned faces and staring eyes watched the monster marble keystone of the arch of the big tower of the Public Buildings at Philadelphia as it swung in air. A slight board railing kept the crowd from getting under the stone. Sender two-inch steel cables, looking hardly strong enough to bear a workman's weight, held the mass. A tall man, with reddish whiskers, made the signal to "hoist away," and a black giant arm stretched out from above the marble top, 120 feet in the air, gathered in the slender cords. The figure of a workman, seeming as though viewed from the larger end of a telescope, walked out upon the giant's arm and looked down. Beneath the stone a mason nonchalantly chipped away with hammer and chisel at a marble block. The grimy giant's arm made a sweep and stopped over the aperture where the six tons of marble were to lodge. From the crowd below the immense block looked as though two men could lift it. Across Penn Square the brass hands of the Broad Street Station clock pointed to half an hour before the keystone was in place.

"The heaviest stone in the tower is the cornice piece in the dome forming the lower front of the tower. It weighs forty-seven tons," said foreman Lawrence. "I expect to have all the stonework completed by the end of the season of 1884. The height of the tower then will be 360 feet. From that elevation the iron work commences and goes up 155 feet higher, until, to the crown of William Penn's hat, the height of 535 feet is reached."—Philadelphia Times.

Pretty Rubies in Pink.

Now, in place of bows, these gallant knights of the pink coats, knee-breeches, wigs, queues, etc., behead and unyou suppose? Nothing more nor less than an old bag of unsweetened, which they owned to be dragged around over a few miles of rose cross country. Last year "mint" served as a sample. Lemon farmer's mint, from Schuylerville way, was dried in bunch up six odd months in the bag of unsweetened and perfumed the whole month. He was real to wood chimney, stony country, ravines, water over a foot deep, sans that would bear the "pink," etc., and to otherwise do as a sure fox would for his life would go to. Lem moved to the better. He picked out broad, smooth fields, and when he came to a fence would set down the reins or cinch of the top rink. After dragging the old rag-bag around and around, to prime sight of some forced spot where the "kerrigee" would be unexpectantly located, Lem would take the nice as a blue-clump of lilacs in a bag field, to be cangot at the fence.

At a proper time away would go the horses and dogs, who were to be rated for so long in one solid company, and after disporting themselves in sight of some I dies and gentlemen—always very few—or had an hour, the dogs would scuff out the sacking, and we would run some of the assistants and capture the "stuff"—which would be in a real two—no mistake, a full, and handsome would engulf the "stuff," or face, and the dash ever-active worries, spattered a little, perhaps, with mud, would move along Broadway prouder than princes.—Troy Times.

There are now 400 deer in General Harding's park, six miles from Nashville, Tenn. The surrounding Harding family's deer for venison and the large number of friends frequently supplied with the delicacy, the herd increases rapidly. At the center of the park is enclosed an sixty-acre lot. The park has 425 acres, and is easily reached within its bounds. General Harding, now a very old man, possesses a grand farm of 4,000 acres.

WESTERN.

A dispatch from Anoka, Indian Territory, gives meager particulars of a bloody affray in which five men were shot. A dance was held at the house of Jim Bounds, in the Chickasaw Nation, by a "reuter" named Buck Smith. During the progress of the dance several white men arrived on horseback, coolly tied their horses, and entered the house without an invitation, and they were treated indifferently. Presently one of the strangers fired a pistol into the ceiling. This was the signal for a general fusillade. One of the guests, named Gordon, opened on the leader of the marauding gang and killed him, but Gordon then received a bullet in his heart. The fight was exhausted and the battle raged. Over a hundred shots were fired. The women ran screaming from the room out into the woods. After five minutes' continued firing two of the five strangers remained, mounted their horses, and escaped. When lights were brought two of the strangers were found dead on the floor, covered with blood and gore. Nearly by three dead guest, including Gordon, while back outside and on other guest were found dying.

The Federal Court of Dallas, Tex., has decided that the Lone Star Gas Company is liable for $12,000 for the destruction of the 15-ft. flume at Greenville during a cyclone in 1885. The gas company was reduced on the ground that the structure blew down.

WASHINGTON

The Gould influence is said to be the strongest of all Democratic influences when approach Washington. The entire strength of the great lobby influence is concentrated against the Senate, and there Gould seems to be having his own way as usual. He has succeeded in inducing the Senate Judiciary Committee until it has agreed upon a bill which is practically a surrender of the interests of the Government in the Union Pacific controversy. Mr. Gould is not in the habit of employing professional lobyists. He never wastes money in giving dinners. His methods are not complicated by securing the best information. There are said to be at Gould's Sub-Treasury who are his active agents. Senator Cockrell expresses the opinion that the terms of an suit will eventually be done away with in the courts. He thinks that the Senate's action should have weight according to its credibility as a witness.

The United States Supreme Court, in considering a suit for damages brought by the widow of a postal agent who was killed by a collision on the Pennsylvania Road, decided that the deceased was in no sense a passenger under the State laws, and no question of Federal authority is involved.

Congressmen were surprised, the other day, to see sparks falling from the roof of the House of Representatives, and, with pages and officers, rushed for the exits, in anticipation of a dynamite explosion. The fire, which broke out in a narrow room near the roof, was extinguished after some delay, and, fortunately, some important records and documents were found to be uninjured. The fire is supposed to have been caused by electric light wires.

Secretary McCulloch sent to the House, the other day, an urgent letter requesting an appropriation of $60,000 to provide for the storage and transportation of silver coin. In his letter Mr. McCulloch mentions that the contingent of the independent Treasury for the current year, $85,000, is nearly exhausted, and a deficiency appropriation of $60,000 will be necessary. A good deal of this money has been used to pay expenses of silver from one place to another. That sum is insufficient compared with the demands upon it. The profits on coinage of silver bullion, and on the transportation of coin from a mint to the Treasury, the Secretary asks that an appropriation of half a million dollars be made immediately available.

Democratic State Convention.

The Democratic State Convention to nominate candidates for the offices of Judge of the Supreme Court and Regents of the State University, will be held at the Wesbover Opera House, Bay City, on Wednesday, February 25, 1885, at 10 o'clock a. m.

All voters of this State, irrespective of past party affiliations, who can unite with us in an effort for a reform of abuses, and a purer and economical administration of government, and all who have a reform in the civil service, and a reduction and readjustment of our tariff laws and tariff taxation, are cordially invited to participate in sending delegates to this convention.

Each county is entitled to one delegate for each two hundred votes cast for Governor at the last general election, and one for every fraction of not less than two hundred and fifty votes. Every organized county is entitled to at least two delegates, and each delegate must be a resident of the county he represents.

JEROME EDDY, Chairman.
H. F. PASSMINTIER, Secretary.

Charlevoix county is entitled to four delegates.

Mississippi with a population of one and one-third millions has only 1,266 dram shops. Wisconsin with about the same population has 6,400. Mississippi has thirteen counties where there are no licensed dram-shops and where no license to keep one can be obtained. It looks very much as if Mississippi also enforces its license law where this prevails. A saloon-keeper of Jackson, the capital, was fined for violating the Sunday law of the state. Shortly afterwards, a civil suit was brought against him for the same violation, as by the statute prohibiting the sale of liquors on Sunday, the violator becomes liable to both a criminal and civil process. The suit was brought for $2,000, being the amount of the bond. After a long trial the case was submitted to the jury, which failed to agree. When the case was recalled at the present term, the judge held that the saloonist's previous confession in the criminal proceeding, was conclusive of his guilt, and instructed the jury to bring in a verdict of guilty, which was done. In cases of this kind the statute provides that half of the judgment recovered goes to the informer and the remainder to the public school fund.

An appeal was taken, but the case has become alarming to other saloon-keepers and one of them has been heard to say that as soon as his present license expires, he shall quit the business as it is impossible to follow it in Mississippi with any profit to himself or safety to his bondsmen.—[Union Signal.

Let's see. Mississippi is one of those hopeless democratic States which gave Cleveland a plurality of 83,000, and sends a solid democratic delegation to congress, while Wisconsin is almost the reverse, politically, having given Blaine over 14,000, plurality, and sends seven republicans to congress. And yet the prohibitionists would have us believe that it alone is the party of temperance and morality.

Notice to all Justices of the Peace.

LANSING, Mich., Feb. 4.—The "act to prohibit justices of the peace or any judge or justice of any police court from sentencing or committing persons to the state house of correction and reformatory at Ionia in certain cases," goes into effects on Tuesday next. It reads as follows:

SECTION 1. The people of the state of Michigan enact that no justice of the peace or judge or justice of any police court shall sentence or commit any person to the state house of correction and reformatory at Ionia, who may be convicted of the crime or offense of being disorderly, of being drunk, or of vagrancy, or for any violation of the provisions of chapter 33 of the compiled laws of 1871, relative to disorderly persons, as amended by act 136 session laws of 1883; or for the larceny of a less sum than $5.

National State Convention.

The National party of the State of Michigan will meet in State convention at Mead's Hall, Lansing, Wednesday, February 25, at 11 o'clock to the forenoon to nominate candidates for Justice of the Supreme Court and Regents of the State University, and to transact such other business as may properly come before the convention. The basis of representation will be as follows: Two delegates at large for each organized county and one additional delegate for each 200 votes and fractions thereof of over even hundreds cast for Benjamin F. Butler in 1884.

STOLEN SWEETS.

BY GEORGIANA PETHERIDGE PENNATON.

When day's footsteps tight have vanished
From the threshold of the west,
When the red lights of the twilight
Have gone thus with moonbeams weave,
Met, ah, meet me! in the glamour,
Hymning, when the birds are flown,
Stolen sweets are sweeter, darlings,
When we both have eaten one.

When the primrose shows of sulphur
Sway the darkening linden tall,
When the rose leaves red are sighing
The earth sod is as they fall,
When the night-jar's wooing, darling,
Wailing 'mouth the darkene boon,
Stolen sweets will lose their rapture
When we both have eaten grown.

In the sunshine there is gladness,
Everything it may see—
But there's something in the moonlight,
Something sublime in love!
Meet, ah, meet me in the gleaming,
To talk in day with joy is sown,
Stolen sweets will lose their rapture
When we both have eaten grown.

I am waiting, I am watching;
Pal I see yourshadow fall
Where the rose leaves in the moonlight
Drift! Tis but the lin-leaf, hold!
Meet, ah, meet me; a pit is calling,
Hymen sweets will lose their rapture
When sweets will lose their rapture
When we both have eaten grown.

UNDECIVED.

Agustine Powers had never felt the fatigue caused by labor nor the hardship and suffering entailed by poverty; but one would be quite mistaken, to see her as she sat listlessly before the piano in her rich and tastefully furnished apartments, that the thoughts of woe and misery never found even a transient place in her breast. But although a young and beautiful, and possessed of every luxury which money could purchase, or a refined taste could contribute, she imposed upon herself the duty of helpmet bear the burdens of her sex who were less fortunate than she, by providing each day for the wants of some unhappy creature. For this purpose her trusty servant Peter was sent out every evening to investigate the condition of such as were receiving her assistance, or to discover new objects for her generosity. At the time she is brought to our notice, her attitude indicates that she has been indulging in one of those harmless reveries called "day dreams." Her thoughts seem to wander far away from her surroundings, and even the crumpled letter which she holds in her hand has apparently ceased to excite her emotion. The reader may, however, glance at this letter. It was written in a plain, school-girl hand, and run thus.

MY KIND FRIEND:—The trouble you have already taken in my behalf causes me to hesitate before acquainting you with what has produced my greatest anxiety; but as you requested me to unify you in case anything occurred, and as you are my only friend, I will do so cautiously. I feel it my duty to inform you that Mr. Schuyler grows wrong daily, and at whose instigation I know not, but I suspect the hand of Mr. Fowler, whose I am firmly convinced, is at the bottom of my misery and degradation, passed the house where I am this morning. He has evidently discovered my whereabouts, for he looked very hard at the window, and will, I fear, use every means to find me out. Oh! and then left me to be alone, I could still endure him; for, notwithstanding all the distress he has caused, the vision of happy moments still flitting in my vacant chambers of my heart. What his object may be in seeking me out I cannot say. He can ever I will drive or die true unto, for I am a sire be-cause of a selfish one, and disease has been contrived, but this I will never do.

I shall write you as many times, dear, I think I will be happy, but I am so weak that I can scarcely hold the pen.

What shall I do? Cannot you, my good friend, advise me? I am so entirely alone. Your humble friend, MARY.

Miss Powers had read this letter an hour or so previous to our introduction to her, but now she seemed to have lost all interest in its contents.

Presently a servant entered bearing a card which he handed to his mistress. "Ah, Mr. Walter," she muttered half aloud; "show him in, William." A moment later Mr. Walter was ushered into the room. His appearance was that of a man about six and twenty, not over handsome, but with a face filled with intelligence and a tall, well proportioned frame. As his eyes met those of Miss Powers his countenance plainly told the admiration with which he regarded her. All his inmost soul seemed expressed in that one look. "I have brought you," he said, after a moment's pause, "some money your father requested me to hand you. He also wished me to ask, now that Peter is ill, if I could be of any assistance by accompanying you on your visit to that poor girl of whom you spoke to him this morning?"

"How thoughtful papa is," interrupted the girl; "and I am sure it is very kind of you, Mr. Walter, to consent to render me such a service. I am quite certain you did not understand this was to be part of your duty when you entered the banking house of Powers, Farlow & Co."

The young man was about to make some remark expressive of his willingness to undertake the mission with so agreable a companion, when he was interrupted by the entrance of a servant bearing the card of Mr. Nathan Farlow. Mr. Powers' partner in business. "Good afternoon Miss Powers," exclaimed that gentleman as soon as she had "I am indeed happy to see you looking so much better than you were yesterday. Ah! good afternoon, Mr. Walker," for the first time glancing in the direction of his employee, "you have left the office rather early this afternoon."

"I was to deliver a message from Mr. Powers," replied the clerk.

"Yes," added Miss Powers, "Mr. Walker has come to offer me his services by accompanying me on a visit of mercy this afternoon."

"Ah!" and Nathan Farlow's face lost its pleasant expression. "I should like to offer my assistance if I could hope to gain that pleasure which Mr. Walker seems to have inspired."

"Why, Nathan exclaimed Miss Powers, "I always imagined you would much rather be at your club than wading through filthy streets and tenements in search of worthy institutions. But if you would really like to accompany me, I should be so happy to have you go to-night," and her face lighted up with real pleasure as she spoke.

"What is the special object of your visit, and at what hour do you intend going?" inquired Farlow.

"Oh, there is no fixed time," replied Miss Powers; "I usually send Peter out shortly before dark. It is the time most people who deserve assistance are to be found at what they call their homes."

The other part of the question she seemed either not to hear or to ignore, perhaps, on account of its delicate nature, or else had forgotten it, at least it went unanswered.

During this conversation, Walter had remained a quiet spectator. Several times he ahs-mipted to say that, since his services would not be required, he had better hasten back to the office, but on each occasion he was interrupted. Now, however, he embraced the opportunity and was soon on his way down town.

When Augustine and Farlow were left alone, the conversation turned upon matters which more nearly concerned their personal claims and pleasure. For it must be known that Nathan was Miss Powers' affianced, and that marriage was to take place at no distant day. That the only child of that proud aristocrat, Schuyler, Powers should marry a man of Nathan Farlow's wealth and social position seemed but natural. Mr. Farlow was what would be termed "a man of the world," handsome in appearance and fascinating in manner. Nor did he lack the qualities that gained the purest affections of his lovely girl, as they conversed together on the bright autumn afternoon, no one could doubt the depth of her feeling. Once during the conversation when Miss Powers reverted to the sad cases of the young girl they were about to visit, and pictured the errand treatment and misery she had endured, a keen observer might have noticed a flush pass over the handsome face of Farlow, which deepened perceptibly when she expressed her sympathy for the poor creature, and her confidence for the man who had so lonely received her.

Just previous to their intended departure, Farlow gazed anxiously at his watch, and then, as if a sudden thought struck him, said:

"I am sorry, Augustine, that it will be impossible for me to accompany you to-night. I have an important engagement, which I had entirely forgotten—you must defer your visit until to-morrow, when I shall be glad to assist you in doing so good a work."

With reluctance the young girl promised to comply with his request, and, neglect what she knew to be, her present duty. After some further conversation which occupied twenty, Farlow left her an affectionate adieu.

He had scarcely left the room when a servant entered with a note addressed to Miss Powers. The handwriting was the same as that received a few hours previous, although it was evidently the weaker and far more unsteady hand. It contained the following:

MY VERY KIND FRIEND: If you can conveniently, please do come and see me. I have grown so much worse during the morning, and I fear a sad and miserable life will soon be ended. I am the only friend I have in the world. Do not deny my last request.

MARY.

Miss Powers had no sooner finished reading this note than her course was decided upon. Surely, thought she, Nathan will not object to my respond ing to so earnest an appeal as this. I will send immediately for Walter and get him to accompany me.

A few lines were hastily sent to the office, and in a half hour Mr. Walter was at her side.

"I thought you had forgotten me," replied the man. "Do you think I was my affairs repeated to such a silly feel to this Miss Powers smiled to herself. Seeing his be moved hastily toward the door, and as it flew open the dashed and many forms of Nathan Farlow met the cold, scornful glance of Augustine Powers. He staggered back a moment, then stepped forward, and would have barrier past her, but she stood in the doorway and prevented his passage. Then summoning all her courage, and with a look of infinite disdain, she took him by the coat sleeve and led him to the bedside of the dying girl. All through this scene not a word in the room, who was none other than the unfortunate Mary, spoed vacantly around as if bewildered by the strange company. Then, as if suddenly recalling her senses, she seemed to comprehend the question Miss Powers was about to ask. "No, no! my dear Miss Powers, this is not the man I spoke of. He never treated me cruelly. Did you, William? Nor would never desert your little Mary. You said so, William?" She was exhausted fast falling. "William," she murmured, holding out her thin white hand toward him, "they shall never see that you deceived me. He would never deceive me." She grasped his hand tightly, and added, in half broken whispers: "I hope God will forgive me for all the wrong I have done. Tell bless you, William." These were the last words she uttered. In a few seconds she was a corpse. For a moment all remained quiet as the grave. Then, as if moved by a sudden impulse, Farlow made one dash for the door, and ran hastily down stairs and into the street.

The Powers family never saw him after that night. Through his attorney he withdrew his interest in the firm of Powers, Farlow & Co., and it was reported that he had purchased a farm in Powers, after making provision, as well as her condition would allow, for the burial of her dead friend, was taken with a severe fit of illness which lasted many months, and, the physicians say, was caused by extreme nervousness.

Many years after night have been seen, in one of the daily papers, the notice of the marriage of Augustine Powers, daughter of Schuyler Powers, to Jesse Walter, of the firm of Powers, Waltser & Co.

Cassy, of Michigan, Mr. Clay had his watermelon set out before him. He said: 'Now, gentlemen, you have before you the most magnificent product of the vegetable kingdom. Now, here is the most magnificent product of the animal kingdom—butter.' Well, sir, Mr. Clay proceeded to butter his wat-melon, and as it flew open the dashed and many forms of Nathan Farlow met the cold, scornful glance of Augustine Powers. He staggered back a moment, then stepped forward, and would have barrier past her, but she stood in the doorway and prevented his passage. Then summoning all her courage, and with a look of infinite disdain, she took him by the coat sleeve and led him to the bedside of the dying girl. All through this scene not a word in the room, who was none other than the unfortunate Mary, spoed vacantly around as if bewildered by the strange company. Then, as if suddenly recalling her senses, she seemed to comprehend the question Miss Powers was about to ask. "No, no! my dear Miss Powers, this is not the man I spoke of. He never treated me cruelly. Did you, William? Nor would never desert your little Mary. You said so, William?" She was exhausted fast falling. "William," she murmured, holding out her thin white hand toward him, "they shall never see that you deceived me. He would never deceive me." She grasped his hand tightly, and added, in half broken whispers: "I hope God will forgive me for all the wrong I have done. Tell bless you, William." These were the last words she uttered. In a few seconds she was a corpse. For a moment all remained quiet as the grave. Then, as if moved by a sudden impulse, Farlow made one dash for the door, and ran hastily down stairs and into the street.

The Powers family never saw him after that night. through his attorney he withdrew his interest in the firm of Powers, Farlow & Co., and it was reported that he had purchased a farm in Powers, after making provision, as well as her condition would allow, for the burial of her dead friend, was taken with a severe fit of illness which lasted many months, and, the physicians say, was caused by extreme nervousness.

Many years after night have been seen, in one of the daily papers, the notice of the marriage of Augustine Powers, daughter of Schuyler Powers, to Jesse Walter, of the firm of Powers, Waltser & Co.

HUMOR.

THE price of writing paper is going up. We always thought it was stationery.

AMERICAN young ladies who have been abroad assert that it is dreadfully hard to find an honest One L.

FRENCH crequets are a lale thing at fashionable restaurants. There will be many a crake ale in this way.

"MR. SMITH, do you dye your hair?" asked the man by the side of her. "Why, what do you think, sir?" "O, I dunno, only it's black, and sakes said she reckoned you was born light-headed."

TOO CAUTIOUS: He—I am going to take you home a bottle of salt-water as a memento of this watering-place. She—But don't lift it too hill, or it will spill over on us when the tide comes in.

AMERICAN RENOVATORS now undertake to repair garments and set new bottoms. An immortal man can now meet a Vassar College girl during leap-year without dodging into a barber-shop.

"IS IT cold up your way?" was asked of a man from fifty miles north of St. Paul. "Well, I should say it was. We had to give the stove-tom doses of strychnine yesterday to keep it from shaking the lids off."

"CAN you tell me, sir," asked a young lady at a book store, "in what order Tha-kerray wrote his books?" "No, lady," replied the gentlemanly salesman; "but, don't you know, I guess it was in order to make money."

Whilst sickening fever of mothers roll,
Of your cool name, and wind cool ball,
And head and cold complain,

The Florida Mosquito.

That there are localities and seasons where mosquitoes are of enormous size and ferocity and in great numbers, writes a Florida correspondent of The Chicago Lead Leader, is not to be denied. A friend from the coast mosquito-bars are the exception, but I think that during a part of every summer people everywhere would prefer their comfort if they provided their beds with them. It is a curious fact that the presence of mosquitoes in great numbers depends upon excessive droughts. In a normal condition of things, when the ponds remain full, the fish, in which the ponds abound, consume the "wigglers," and mosquitoes are only produced in such wet places as are destitute of fish. But when the ponds become—as they sometimes do—completely dried up, and are again filled by the rains before they are reached with fish, the wigglers reappear, and mosquitoes are generated in countless millions. But the fish presently return from some unknown hiding-places (it is a mystery to us) and I have observed a parallel in Siskiyou county, California), and in a few weeks opposite the ponds with young fish and the mosquitoes disappear. On the coast, which they are never so numerous as in the interior, there are more predators, though scarcely rising to the proportions of a serious pest except during July, August and September. The draining—and sometimes this is a simple affair—of the neighboring sand-flats, where the tide and rains create brackish lagoons, tends greatly to mitigate them.

Sand-flies are just as bad, and no worse than in light sandy soils anywhere where dogs and swine are allowed to circulate in or close about the house. They are no worse than they are in a certain class of hotels on the sand-lots of San Francisco. The presence of flies to any considerable extent is a reproach to the personal habits of the inhabitants wherever found. Much the same may be said of house-flies—they accuse the farmer himself. But no house, whether in Florida, or elsewhere, ought to be without screens. There is a large rattlesnake, not exactly the same species as that of the west and north, and, away from the coast, the ground rattlesnake, and about sloughs and lagoons several varieties of the moccasin. It is said that the native Floridians never kill a non-poisonous snake, as there are several varieties of them which assist in making war on the poisonous kinds. If I were living in the country here, I should, as a measure of security, either keep shrubbery out of the yard, and vigorously employ a lawn-mower, or I should (like the native Californians) exclude all vegetation from the yard, and keep the ground beaten down smooth and hard. I have yet to see my first snake in Florida.

A Headdress of Sponge.

Did I not tell you some time ago, when I was writing up mushroom in vanin, that if you waited long enough I would find something lower still than that vegetable to decorate your hands with? and of the useful sponge turns up lost in the nick of time, as a fashion empire, where the word sound to have yielded up its heretofore-thought-of ornament to the shrine of fancy.

As a quite lunny, as Lou Harriss's would say, "very, very funny," this idea of wearing on your head the same thing with which you wash your head; but still the sponge as a novelty is immense—would it be more immense should the wearer of the same be caught in a shower.

As it is, the sponge is cut flat, and decorated with loops of gold thread stuck into the holes, as it would be, if would swell up under that shower, making the head appear as a cabbage, the golden loops retiring as an umbrell within their soft cases. Oh! I would give—well, all I have in my purse—a new nickel to see the courtesies women who would go out in a rainstorm with a sponge on the top of her pate. Nevertheless, being in music, you can make up a sponge chapeau awfully cheap. For example, I see old men carrying baskets full of the coarse kind along the streets. These are perfectly worthless as washers, but for caps—oh ma! Think of it! You can hect down, the man, who asks ten cents apiece, into giving you two for fifteen cents; four its worth of gold thread, fifteen cents; put in loops into each one; a yard or two of mock lace, tousled up with a little gold tinsel, and you have a bonnet fit for anyone. Even Langtry ought be proud of the latest novelty.

Panurgian Philosophy.

De whitest shirt sun sometimes got in de slimiest way.

De passon wid er foul mouf is er passon wid er foul name. Its groun' hisself is turned wide ugly wid ugly grows.

Er soft voice ain't always de sign o' ar tender soul. De wildest hoss a mighty pitiful cry, but, good Lawd, he's runk pg'un.

I never seed a passon sofgnorant dat he couldn't pick out flaws an' find fault. Er man hev' ragger kin say dat de Presiduent am er fool.

Ef de sheepse mou mud as much 'slow to tell de truth as he is ter tell er lie, truth wouldbecome so powerful and lies so scarce dat de universe ory a lie would outshine de virtue o' de truth.

Honesty may run far er long time in er hurry, but it somet mes runs out. De wisest lie I ever seen was de sun o' er honest lottner an' minister. It wasn't right ter raise er calle ter jedicke dat he's lookin' ter be lonsed fos' 'cause his trotter was. Honesty wud see man is like jesus wid er hoss. Charles Sumner's Widow.

A rumor that the well-known American banker in London, Mr. Junius S. Morgan, is to marry the divorced wife of Charles Sumner has obtained a limited circulation. It has been published in a New Orleans paper as a fact already announced by authority in London. It will very naturally create some surprise, for Mr. Morgan is about 70 years old, and was supposed to have passed the marriage point. His first wife died six or seven years ago. She was a daughter of John Pierpont, the American poet, who died at Medford, Mass., in 1866. He was at the time holding an office in the Treasury Department at Washington, which had been given him in recognition of his services as chaplain in a Massachusetts regiment during the war. Mrs. Morgan was a lady of great culture and very handsome, and was a fitting companion of her distinguished husband. They had two or three children, the best known of whom is Mr. John Pierpont Morgan, of the New York banking firm of Drexel, Morgan & Co. J. S. Morgan went over to London in 1857 or thereabouts with George Peabody, who that year came over to America and established the Peabody Institute at his old home, Danvers, Mass. Mr. Morgan had already made a fortune. He began life as a clerk in a cotton goods establishment in Hartford, Conn., and after prospering till he became a partner in the house sold out and went to Boston, where he became associated with one of the largest importing concerns there. It was thus that he got his London acquaintance and must be attributed the admiration and friendship of Mr. Peabody. When he went over to London he became associated with Mr. Peabody in the banking business. He was the "O" of George Peabody & Co., and immediately became a great favorite with the first people of London and American visitors. He is a gentleman of splendid appearance, the most refined tastes and agreeable manner. The banking house of J. S. Morgan & Co. is known all over the world, and through it most Americans transact their London business. Mr. Morgan is worth at least $20,000,000, and has a country house near London that is noted for its Elizabethan architecture and beautiful surroundings. The lady to whom they say he is to be married wears the name of Mrs. Alice Mason. She abscorded the Summer name when she got the divorce, thus, her very celebrated Massachusetts statesman. She was a widow when he married her, and her first husband's name was Mason. The third name she chose is Keep. There has always been a mystery about her separation from Sumner. They were married soon after the war, in 1866. I believe, and the next year she got her divorce. They lived together but a few months, when she left him in disgust. Sumner was then an old man and had always lived a bachelor, and he did not long survive his unfortunate matrimonial venture. Mrs. Mason is not yet an old woman, having been quite young and very attractive in personal appearance when she was married to Sumner. She has an ample fortune to lay her own right.—New York World.

Labor and Longevity.

Ericsson, the veteran inventor, was 81 years old recently. He is in excellent health, and works. It is said, sixteen hours a day, proving an exception to the general rule, like many others that are received without question, is a fallacy. Perhaps it might be fairly asserted that men live longer than idle men; that work is, after all, the true elixir of life. Many noteworthy instances where longevity coincides with remarkable mental activity will easily occur to the reader.

Was not Sophocles more than 90, when, to prove that he was not in his dotage—as his heirs claimed, in order to get his money—he wrote one of his greatest tragedies? Did not Humboldt do more work at forescore than many brisk men do at forty? Goethe, as every one knows, died with pen in hand at the age of 82. Von Ranke, the foremost of living historians, has just published another volume of his Universal History; he will be 89 years next December. Carlyle and Emerson lost none of their vigor until they reached three-score years and ten.

And to-day, who imagines that Oliver Wendell Holmes, already on the verge of 75, is old? Longfellow did none of his best work shortly before his death, at 75, and Whittier is one two years older than that. The vest energies, whose sum in many directions are known as Victor Hugo, show no signs of decrepitude, although it is now more than eighty-two years since Victor Hugo was born. Historians, it may be remarked, have usually been long lived.

Voltaire died at 84. Thiers and Michiels, at 76; Mignet and Guizot, at 87. George Bancroft is now 81, and George Tickner lived to be 83. In public life we have had several recent examples of great men whose power for state manship did not diminish through age. Gladstone is nearly 75, and Palmerston was Prime Minister at the time of his death, two days before he had completed 81 years. Benjamin Franklin, in the last century, lived to be 84.

A Brooklyn bridge policeman says: "It is a curious thing that I am never asked the way by the Chinese. All other nationalities bother with their questions about the bridge, the railroad, etc., but John Chinaman, strangely enough, every time knows where he is going and the way to get there."

The British have records of 223 earthquakes in the last 556 years, and the issue are still there.

Epidemics and Temperature.

It has happened over and over again that an epidemic at a particular spot has lingered on for several weeks in a desultory fashion before its real intensity was felt. This was the case at Toulon itself in 1865, when the mortality for the first few weeks remained even below what it has been on the present occasion, rising suddenly to about fifty deaths a day in the middle of September. A sudden rise or fall is generally to be explained by a change in the weather. Nothing is more likely than the decline of an epidemic of cholera in one place, or all over the country when the winter cold begins. On the other hand, the disease usually reaches its height as the temperature goes up, although the rule is not an invariable one. Moisture and heat together are much more likely to cause an increase of cholera than heat and drought, and, in fact, the autumnal months have generally seen a larger mortality than spring and summer.—New York Commercial Advertiser.

A Georgia gentleman is reported in the Atlanta Constitution as saying: "I can take forty Jersey cattle on a good farm and make more money than any other farmer ever made with forty negro slaves on the same land. A man who owns a herd of registered Jerseys and a Georgia farm is richer than a man who owned the same number of slaves before the war. If every freed slave in Georgia," said he, warming with the subject, "was emancipated to-day with a good Jersey, in ten years Georgia would be richer than if the emancipation proclamation had never been wrote. You'd better not print this, though; for if you do the Yankees might take a notion to come down and free the cows."

EASTERN.

At a Socialist meeting at New York the other night, rioting began, and upon police interference, the gathering grew violent and assaulted the officers. The latter used their clubs freely, severely punishing the mob. Justus Schwab was arrested, and refused release on bail.

O'Donovan Rossa was shot at five times in New York, by an Italian woman giving the name of Violet Dudley. The affair took place in Chambers street, near Broadway. Only the first shot took effect, making a serious wound in the back. The woman was seized by a city marshal with the smoking revolver in her hand. Rossa was led to the Chambers street hospital, where he made a statement that his assailant sought two interviews for the purpose of contributing money to the dynamite cause. She expressed regret at the failure of her attempt.

H. Leonard & Co., leather dealers of Boston, Mass., have failed with liabilities estimated at $200,000.

A marked improvement in the iron trade is visible at Philadelphia. Nails will soon be advanced to $2.20, on account of the exhaustion of stocks. Steel rails in large quantities are held at 127. The Edgar Thomson steel works will resume shortly, and business has commenced in one of Oliver's mills at Pittsburgh.

A sensational report from Pittsburg conveys intelligence of an anticipated outbreak of Scotsmen, who have stored large quantities of arms and ammunition in that city and are ready for an attack upon the capitalists. Men from the Hocking Valley and elsewhere are said to be ready for a disturbance.

O'Donovan Rossa, who was shot by Mrs. Dudley, continues to improve, but the woman was held without bail to await the result of his injuries. As a precautionary measure Capt. Thomas, recently stabbed in O'Donovan's office, has been removed to another hospital, it being feared that Rossa's friends might make another attempt on him.

A loss of over $1,000,000 was incurred in New York by the burning of a marble building in Bleecker street, occupied by several manufacturing firms. Seventeen engines were employed in suppressing the blaze.

A dormitory of the Agricultural College at Amherst, Mass., valued at $30,000, was burned. Seven horses lost their lives by fire in the livery stable of A. H. Bates, at Dover, New York.

WESTERN.

A bill in equity has been filed in the United States Circuit Court at St. Louis by the Iron Mountain Railroad Company against the receivers of the Wabash Road to nullify the indorsement of the company on all the Wabash bonds and notes, and to remove Jay Gould, Russell Sage, Russell Sage, and E. L. Ames from the directory of the Iron Mountain Railroad, as they are also Directors of the Missouri Pacific, a competing line.

The Mormon President, John Taylor, said in the course of a few remarks at the Tabernacle on Sunday, that he knew that the Saints were being persecuted in Arizona. He spoke of the Federal forces as inquisitorial and tyrannic, intruding with process from the courts into the houses of the people. The persecutions were making some of the Saints think of going to a foreign country to preserve their religious liberty. No one, he said, was paid for arresting Mormons announcing.

But little remains to be done to make the new Chicago Board of Trade building ready for occupancy. Its cost will not exceed the original estimate, $1,500,000. Fifty of the seventy-seven private offices have already been rented for three years.

It seems that Campbell, the stockman who is at present heading 1500 cattle on the Oklahoma lands, is there without permission. Secretary Teller says that Campbell's cattle being ordered out of the Cherokee and Arapahoe Reservations, he was given permission to drive them through the Oklahoma tract. He was not, however, given permission to stay there.

Herman Kessler became ill at Portage, Wis., upon which a fellow-boarder administered Hivess drops of aconite, mistaken for Kranich's death. The bowder then hugged himself, but was cut down and revived.

The District Court at Cincinnati found T. C. Campbell, the well-known criminal attorney guilty of contempt of the seven charges brought against him by the Bar Association. He was suspended from practice for ten days and ordered to pay the costs.

Green Jefferson, Joel J. Wilson, and John A. Snyder, the murderers of Green Jefferson (father of the first-named), were lynched by a mob at Audubon, Iowa. Snyder and Wilson made a desperate resistance, and were killed in their cells in the jail and afterward strung up, but Jefferson was removed to the public park and there hanged. The Sheriff fired a few shots at the hurrying forces, but without effect.

M. W. Ryan, Clerk of Cook County, Ill., received a summons from Speaker Haines to appear before the House of Representatives with the ballots cast for Representatives in the Sixth Senatorial District last November. The Clerk notified the United States District Attorney, and was subpœnaed to appear before Judge Blodgett, who promptly issued an order that all returns from the Second Ward on the ticket of the Eighteenth Ward be deposited with the Clerk of the Federal Court. By advice of counsel, Mr. Ryan obeyed the Judge's order.

The District Court at Cincinnati modified its order for the suspension of T. C. Campbell from the practice of law, so he will only be required to pay the costs of the proceedings.

A train on the Colorado Central Road was blown from the track, near Georgetown, into a ditch, causing injuries to eighteen persons, among them State Auditor Perrett, of Denver.

The unincorsed association of railwire manufacturers met last week at St. Louis, and agreed to advance prices 5 cents per pound. Fifty delegates of the capitalistic, or unincorsed associations, were present. President J. W. Gates, of the former society, believed that a syndicate will be perfected which will redound to the benefit of all the manufacturers.

SOUTHERN.

Lafayette McHue, who four years ago was captain of a band of Ku Klux which murdered Franklin Dale at Corinth, Ark., has just paid the penalty on the gallows.

Mrs. J. M. Pearl, a teacher in a seminary at Louisville, was burned to death, evidently from placing a newspaper in her hands to take fire at the grate.

Gen. Jas. Chestnut, who was United States Senator from South Carolina at the breaking out of the rebellion, has just died at Camden, S. C.

Richard Weasse, aged 75, arrested in West Virginia for murder, confessed that several twelve persons prior to or during the years of the war. He was also leader of a band of robbers who ravaged that section of the country.

Dr. Christopher C. Graham died at Louisville, Ky., aged 103 years 4 months.

At the gate of a farm in Worth County, Georgia, Sheriff Shivers and Frank Dostrizit, who had been warm friends, suddenly drew revolvers and fired while grappling. They fell dead locked in each other's arms.

WASHINGTON.

Mrs. Laura De Force Gordon, of California, has been admitted to the bar of the United States Supreme Court at Washington. Mrs. Gordon is the second woman who has been admitted to practice before this court, the first being Mrs. Belva A. Lockwood.

Washington dispatch: "The revival of the annual on the charges of the arctic expedition outrun matter of publishing which reflects upon Lieut. Greely is declared to be an attempt to save Greely's reputation. It is true that statements to the effect of those lately printed have been used with members of the Military and the Expedition Committees for the purpose of inducing measures for making Lieut. Greely Assistant Signal Officer. He will now take immediate measures to have the facts connected with these diaries made known."

The Secretary of the Navy has authorized Lieutenant George W. Stoney to make further explorations to Alaska with a party of three officers and ten men. A steamer would be constructed in the navy-yard at San Francisco, and a schooner will convey the expedition to Point on River.

Richelieu Robinson, the Irish member from New York, was approached by Congressman Talbott, of Maryland, on the floor of the House of Representatives, the other day. The latter asked: "Are you not afraid of British assassination? Are you not upon your trip?" Robinson, for an answer, opened his desk and exhibited some dynamite cartridges nearly reposing by the side of his inkbottle. "Great Heaven!" cried Talbott. "There things in your desk!" "Yes, sir." "Are they safe?" "Safe? Why, bless you, they are safe as anything in the world. Why, the whole thing was a joke, and that what he showed was sealing-wax, Talbott knew, however, that they were dynamite cartridges.

POLITICAL.

Washington telegram to the Chicago Tribune: "Mr. Hewitt's election as Senator from New York is considered important in considering whether they can spare Gorman and Brown from the Senate. Both were considered booked—the one for Attorney General, the other for Secretary of State. Curiously, though both were originally conceded as eminently fit appointments, there is more fierce opposition to both. The opposition to Gorman is entirely on the ground that he is a Hamiltonian, a Federalist in his construction of the Constitution."

James K. Jones has been elected United States Senator from Arkansas, the dead-lock being broken on the thirty-first ballot, after a protracted struggle of eleven days. Mr. Jones is a native of Mississippi, but was raised in Arkansas. He resides at Washington, Hempstead County, is 45 years old, and is now serving his third term in Congress.

Washington dispatch to Chicago Tribune: "Senator Garland is the only man that the Democrats have feel certain is going into the caucus. They were certain for a time of Hayter, but now it is noised that he does not care to leave the Senate. On account of the certainty of Garland's selection a number of aspirants have come a paper warfare upon him. The petting of these pellets will not change the situation. The charge that Mr. Garland was once a Federalist is nothing that belongs to the present time. There has been nothing brought out by any one that affects his character or standing in any way. He is very much liked by Mr. Cleveland, and without doubt will have a great deal of influence with him in the next administration."

The election of Mr Evarts as Senator is said to have completely changed the whole Cabinet situation, and it is gravely doubted by the Democrats whether Bayard or Garland can be spared from the Senate.

Gen. F. C. Barlow, of New York, is being urged for Secretary of War, and the indorsement of Samuel J. Tilden.

The Legislature of New Jersey has been petitioned to instruct and request representatives in Congress to urge the passage of a bill making corruption of the ballot box a crime equal to that of treason.

The Wisconsin Senate passed a bill appropriating $25,000 for an exhibit at the New Orleans Exposition; the Indiana House set aside $8,000 for the same purpose, and the Illinois Senate proposes to grant $5,000. Nineteen bills for the removal of enforced irregularities are before the Legislature of Arkansas.

William R. Morrison was nominated by the Democratic Legislative caucus at Springfield for Senator from Illinois on the first ballot, the vote standing 87 for Morrison, 7 to Hamilton, 5 for Black, and 1 for John M. Schofield.

MISCELLANEOUS.

The National Board of Trade, in session at Washington, adopted a resolution asking an investigation into the cause of the enormous waste of the country's wealth by fire. Mr. Covington, who offered the resolution, said there was not the slightest doubt but he was unanimously elected. The convention passed resolutions denouncing the unlimited issuance of white and yellow bullion, and the withdrawal of gold notes. After a conference at the Treasury Department in Washington with three New York bankers, it was agreed that there is nothing to justify the depreciation in the value of silver certificates. The National Board of Trade passed a resolution urging Congress to repeal the law for compulsory silver coinage.

A valuable silver convoy was endangered by a mutiny on its way from Trinco to Carnarvon, Mexico. Government troops are in pursuit of the robbers.

Incoming Foreign exchanges last week—$621,913,407—were $72,625,452 less than the previous week; and, when compared with the corresponding period in 1886, the falling off equals 38.2 per cent.

The clerk of the Merchants' Bank of Belleville, Ont., who absconded some months with $16,000, was arrested last week in Montreal on the charge of embezzlement.

President-elect Cleveland, accompanied by Col. Lamont, visited New York City last week, and Vice-President-Elect Hendricks went to New Orleans to view the World's Exposition.

FOREIGN.

A London dispatch of the 31 inst. says: J. H. Cunningham, who is undergoing examination for causing the explosion at the Tower, is 22 years of age, and was last full employed as a baker on the Mauretania ship Dock at New York. The crown gave notice that the charge against him may possibly be changed to a capital one. He was taken from the prison to the police court in a van guarded by a dozen armed men.

Portugal forestalled the decision of the Congo conference by annexing both banks of the river.

Dispatches from Admiral Courbet announce the capture of the Chinese works commanding the Min river, after a severe fight.

Queen Victoria has expressed a desire to constitutes from her private purse a way round which the Government may decide to offer for the arrest and conviction of the persons guilty of the recent dynamite outrages. It is thought that a national fund will be organized to secure the punishment of dynamiters.

Subscriptions to defray the expenses necessary to Mr. Dudley's defense have been started in England and Canada.

Cunningham, the alleged dynamiter, who is charged with complicity in the Tower explosion, has been identified as the man who was suspected of having been concerned in the recent underground railway explosions.

LATER NEWS ITEMS.

A report will be made to the House of Representatives by the Committee on Foreign Affairs recommending the appointment of a new commission to consider the Venezuelan claims and declaring null the awards of the commission organized in 1885.

Senator Logan was nominated by acclamation at the Republican Legislative caucus at Springfield, Ill. Two members of the House were absent without excuse, indicating to the party leaders.

The proprietors of the United Brunswick, at New York, made an assignment, citing preferences for $18,000.

A box containing a jumping-jack was the other day sent to O'Donovan Rossa, who caused it to be as carefully opened as if it contained an infernal machine. Mr. Dudley received a special card filled with curses and a letter in red ink threatening her life. Rossa had for some time before his late assailant with his desk, been in receipt of many threatening letters. He attached but little importance to them, however. The evening preceding his attempted assassination, he spoke very inveighing speech in New York. An extract reads as follows:

"I believe that Irish heart exists in America, or in the whole world, but wept for joy at the news of the explosion last week. I would pick out a gaper and take him to Trafalgar Square to see who would go to London with me and cut down the lamp posts and set the place on fire hundred fires in 48 hours at the dead of night all strike here in England. Repeat the dose until Ireland is free. England's troubles begin; we are a little dynamite. I tell you to free Ireland we must use dynamite. And this country is passing laws against dynamite conspirators! Bah! Ireland has made a mistake in not using dynamite. Ireland's cell was to free Ireland. Ireland's cell was to free Ireland. Democratic State Convention.

The Democratic State Convention to nominate candidates for the offices of Judge of the Supreme Court and Regents of the State University, will be held at the Westover Opera House, Bay City, on Wednesday, February 26, 1885, at 10 o'clock a. m.

All voters of this state, irrespective of past party affiliations, who can unite with us in an effort for a reform of abuses, and a pure and economical administration of government, and all who favor a reform in the civil service, and a reduction and readjustment of our tariff laws and tariff taxation, are cordially invited to participate in sending delegates to this convention.

Each county is entitled to one delegate for each five hundred votes cast for Governor at the last general election, and one for every fraction of not less than two hundred and fifty votes. Every organized county is entitled to at least two delegates, and each delegate must be a resident of the county he represents.

JEROME EDDY, Chairman.
H. F. PENNINGTON, Secretary.
Charlevoix county is entitled to four delegates.

When Gov. Begole entered upon the discharge of his duties there were no sudden changes of office, all officials removed being given sufficient notice of when they would be superseded. He even retained many republican officials on account of their fitness and qualifications, although by so doing he provoked bitter opposition from many of the leaders of his own party. Gov. Alger gave the Begole appointees no warning, and all the democratic and greenback appointees were bounced in statter. The republicans ought at least to have been as liberal as Gov. Begole, for the sake of their civil service reform pretensions if nothing else. As it is there will not probably be a republican postmaster in any village in Michigan by Jan. 1st '86, and the unfortunate republicans can thank Gov. Alger's administration for the loss of their accustomed fodder.—[Independent.

Smoking, or a Home.

Between fifteen and twenty three years there are tens of thousands of young men dissipating themselves irretrievably by tobacco. You either use very good tobacco, or cheap tobacco. If you use cheap tobacco, I want to tell you why it is cheap. It is a mixture of burdock, laughlack, sawdust, colt's foot, plantain leaves, fuller's earth, lime, salt, alum, and a little tobacco. You cannot afford, my young brother, to take such a mess as that between your lips. If, on the other hand, you use costly tobacco, let me say, I do not think you can afford it. You take that which you expend, and will expend, if you keep the habit all your life, and put it aside, and it will buy you a home, and it will buy you a farm, to make you comfortable in the afternoon of life. A merchant of New York gave this testimony: "In early life I smoked six cigars a day, at six and a half cents each; they averaged that. I thought to myself one day: 'I'll just put aside all the money I am consuming in cigars, and all I would consume if I kept on in the habit, and I will see what it will come to by compound interest.'" And he gives this tremendous statistic: "Last July completed thirty-nine years since, by the grace of God, I was emancipated from the filthy habit, and the saving amounted to the enormous sum of $23,102.03 by compound interest. We lived in the city, but the children, who had learned something of the enjoyment of country life from their annual visits to their grandparents, hunged for a home among the green fields. I found a very pleasant place in the country for sale. The cigar money now came into requisition, and I found that it amounted to a sufficient sum to purchase the place; and it is mine. I wish all American boys could see how my children enjoy their home, as they watch the vessels with their white sails that course along the Sound. Now, boys, you take your choice: smoking without a home, or a home without smoking.—Young Reaper.

The Chicago

Weekly News

AND THE

Charlevoix Journal

ONE YEAR

For $2.00

THE CHICAGO WEEKLY NEWS is now an eight page, sixty-four column paper. It is the largest "dollar weekly" in America. Its eight broad long pages present each week a mass of carefully selected matter, containing much to suit each of the varying tastes of the family circle. Fine and literature it gives all. THE NEWS, complete as to details, yet concise in form. Its connection with the CHICAGO DAILY NEWS (member of the Associated Press) gives a facility for news gathering unsurpassed by any journal in the country. Its MARKET REPORTS are specially complete and thoroughly trustworthy. Particular attention is given to agricultural and home matters. Every issue contains six CONTINUED STORIES, and a regular installment of an original story by some well-known English or American author, exclusively secured for the CHICAGO DAILY NEWS. Condensed notes on fashions, art, industries, literature, science, etc., etc., appear regularly.

Few papers in the country are so extensively quoted by the press in general for its bright and humorous paragraphs as the Chicago Daily News. These are all reproduced in the WEEKLY NEWS. In its editorial expression the paper speaks from the standpoint of the INDEPENDENT journalist, thereby escaping the temptation to support or excuse the questionable under the pressure of party allegiance. Mere partisan extremists will not like it, the large minded and thoughtful of all parties will appreciate and value its candid statements of facts and conclusions, all calculated to qualify the reader for the formation of his own intelligent opinion. The political events of the year to come promise to assume such a character that a thoroughly truthful and impartial record becomes all important rather than a partisan one, colored and perverted to individual liking.

In all its departments the CHICAGO WEEKLY NEWS aims to present an up-to-date, impartial and entertaining family newspaper of the very highest grade.

WHAT OLD SUBSCRIBERS SAY

When they Renew their Subscriptions.

William Cannon, Pioneer, Colusa County, Cal., says: "I think it is the best paper in America."

A. Wendt, Sullivan, Ill., says: "It is better than some of the papers."

Mrs. J. Mahaffey, Cherokee, Cherokee Nation, Kansas, says: "In comparing your paper with other weeklies, I find, and years, the NEWS has the best of them. I have taken it 'off and on' for 15 years, and I know whereof I speak. It is the newspaper of the day. It is far ahead of the Tribune."

Alfred T. Fowler, Woodbury, Bruce County, Mich., says: "It is one of the cleanest papers published."

W. H. Hooker, Alpena, Mich., says: "I don't want to miss a number. It is the best paper for the money I have taken."

Peter Lansing, Ovids, Sandusky County, Ohio, says: "I like your paper. I have taken it for the benefit of some weekly journals, I can speak in the highest terms of the NEWS. It is the cleanest of the weekly issues, either in politics, giving you the impartial truth concerning the actions of all political parties."

H. E. Bawtenel, Palmyra, N. Y., says: "It is the cleanest and best paper I give to read."

Mrs. L. Johnson, Crawford, Miss., says: "I like your paper very much. I get six other papers, but do not like them as well as the WEEKLY NEWS."

W. E. Lee, Marietta, Tex., says: "I am highly pleased with the NEWS. For I get half-a-dozen papers from other places, but find the NEWS of the previous week's issue usually more interesting to me in a strictly party journal of other cities."

Its size and character considered, the CHICAGO WEEKLY NEWS is the cheapest weekly in America. ONE DOLLAR A YEAR, postage included. Our special Clubbing Terms bring it within the reach of all our subscribers. Specimen copies may be seen in this office. Send subscriptions to this office.

PROBATE ORDER FOR HEARING FINAL ACCOUNT.—State of Michigan, County of Charlevoix, ss. Probate Court for said County. At a session of the Probate Court for said County of Charlevoix, at the Probate Office, in the City of Charlevoix, on Tuesday, the third day of February, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and eighty-five. Present, James A. Keat, Judge of Probate. In the matter of the estate of ISAAC STAFFORD, an incompetent person.

Henry H. Vanderwarker, guardian of said estate, comes into court and represents that he is now prepared to render his final account of his guardianship. Therefore it is ordered that Monday, the second day of March next, at ten o'clock in the afternoon, be assigned for examining and allowing such account, and that the several persons interested in said estate are required to appear at a session of said court, then to be holden at the Probate Office, in the City of Charlevoix, in said county, and show cause if any there be, why the said account should not be allowed. And it is further ordered, that said guardian give notice to the persons interested in said estate of the pendency of said account, and the hearing thereof, by causing a copy of this order to be published in the CHARLEVOIX JOURNAL, a newspaper printed and circulated in said county, three successive weeks previous to said day of hearing.

A true copy. JAMES A. KEAT,
82-83 Judge of Probate.

WHEREAS, default has been made in the payment of the money secured by a mortgage dated the nineteenth day of October, A. D. 1883, executed by Michael Doran, a single man of Charlevoix, Michigan, to Samuel A. Gibson, of the same place, which said mortgage was duly recorded in the office of the register of deeds in the County of Charlevoix, in liber "S" of mortgages, on page 424, on the 20th day of October, A. D. 1883, at 8:30 o'clock a. m. And whereas the amount now claimed to be due on said mortgage at the date of this notice is the sum of Eight Hundred Dollars, of principal and interest, and which is the sum claimed to be unpaid and no suit nor proceeding having been instituted at law to recover the debt now remaining secured by said mortgage, or any part thereof whereby the power of sale contained in said mortgage has become operative. Now, therefore, by virtue of the power of sale contained in said mortgage, and the statute in such case made and provided, the said mortgage will be foreclosed by a sale of the premises therein described, at public vendue, to the highest bidder, at the front door of Lewis Hall, in the village of Charlevoix, in said county, that being the place where the Circuit Court for the county of Charlevoix is held, on the third day of April next, at two o'clock in the forenoon of that day, which said premises are described in said mortgage as follows: All of Lots Thirty-four (34), Thirty-five (35), and Thirty-six (36), of Corbin and Hulbert's addition to the village of Charlevoix, according to the recorded plat thereof.

Dated at Charlevoix, Michigan, this 6th day of January, A. D. 1885.

The new church of the Congregational society at Central Lake, Rev. W. P. Wilcox pastor, was dedicated on Sunday, Feb. 8, by Rev. C. F. Van Auken; Rev. Mr. Ranney, of Charlevoix, assisting in the ceremonies. The day was one of the fine pleasant ones of the season, and a large congregation was in attendance. In order to complete the payments for the church, and leave the society clear from debt, a subscription was set on foot, and in about twenty minutes the sum of two hundred and fifteen dollars was raised, which was pronounced sufficient for the purpose. The society is fortunate in thus being enabled to start free from debt, with a new and handsome church building.—[Bellaire Breeze. The illness of the pastor threw upon Mr. Van Auken almost the entire work of dedication, he conducting three services, preaching three sermons, and raising the money required.

Traverse City and Petoskey.

Messrs. Hannah, Lay & Co. have leased the Petoskey Union Dock and Warehouse and will have an agent of their boats in charge or the same next season. Their steamers, Paxton and City of Grand Rapids, will next season each make daily round trips between Traverse City, Petoskey and Harbor Springs. One of these boats will leave Traverse City every morning for Petoskey and Harbor Springs, touching at Charlevoix and all points on the bay possible and make the round trip, returning to Traverse City in the evening. The other boat will leave Harbor Springs every morning for Petoskey, Charlevoix and Traverse City, touching at all points possible, returning to Harbor Springs the same evening. By this arrangement a person can take the boat from Traverse City to any of the points named and return the same evening. The boat that lays up over night at Harbor Springs will on Sundays run to Petoskey, Cross Village and back. By arrangement with the railroad company tickets between this line and the G. R. & I. will be interchangeable. A person can purchase a ticket at Grand Rapids, or any other station south of Walton junction, for Petoskey, and if he chooses to go by the way of Traverse City and the steamboat line, all he will have to do will be to inform the conductor of that fact and he will receive a check for his ticket, entitling him to go that way. Returning, a ticket issued by either the boat line or railroad line will be good on either. The Grand Rapids and Paxton will both be put in the best shape for the season's business. Quite extensive repairs and improvements will be made on the Paxton. The hurricane deck will be extended aft so as to cover the entire promenade deck. This, with several minor alterations and improvements, will add much to the comfort of passengers. Both of these boats have become very popular with the traveling public, and we believe that another season they will become still more so.—[Traverse Eagle.

The Grand Encampment of Michigan met at Allegan last week. Charlevoix was represented in the person of A. D. Cruickshank, who returned home with some of the honors, he having been elected one of the grand officers. Like numerous others, he got the benefit of the blizzard, and was snow-bound twenty seven hours at Kalkaska. He and Judge Fallas of Cadillac threw their influence in favor of Big Rapids for the next annual meeting, and were rewarded with success. Following are the officers elected:

Grand Patriarch—L. Z. Munger, of St. Johns.
Grand High Priest—Geo. Greenfield, Marshall.
Grand Senior Warden—John B. Alward, Caro.
Grand Scribe—E. H. Whitney, Lansing.
Grand Treasurer—Harrison Soule, Jackson.
Grand Junior Warden—Andrew Barnhart, Alpena.
Representative to Sovereign Grand Lodge—S. S. Francis, Battle Creek.

The following officers were appointed:

Grand Marshal—James M. Madison.
Inside Sentinel—A. D. Cruickshank.
Outside Sentinel—H. D. Thompson.

Liberal Club.

The cold weather of Monday evening caused a light attendance at the meeting of the club; however, those present enjoyed a pleasant and profitable evening. Mr. Black's lecture was interesting, and met with but little criticism. The music of the evening was by some of the best talent in Charlevoix, and was a valuable part of the entertainment. It is now probable that there will not be another meeting of the club until the closing meeting in April.

Real Estate Transfers.

The following is a list of transfers of real estate in Charlevoix county, for the week ending Tuesday evening, Feb. 17, 1885, as recorded in the office of the register of deeds:

MIRAGE.

BY EUGENE FIELD.

We'll read this book, we'll sing that song,
That when I die, when the days are long,
When the glim are free, and voices low,
Some fancy thus within the vear—
The dame (may it be with a fallow trend,
The song assume) the book unread.

We'll see that friend and make him feel
The weight of friendship, (me as said,
Some flower of sympathy bestow—
That (may memory on with regard thee,
Yea, with quick, impassioned tear,
Strew on my flowers upon his bier.

And still we walk the evening sands,
And still with arrow fill our hands,
Whichever, just beyond our reach,
A taper gleams—down to each
Of us—the years—and some, (at what, Beneath) is found no—unfulfilled.

"THE WEB OF OUR LIFE IS OF TANGLED YARN."

BY ANNABEL S. WHITE (DIXY PEE).

The old house seemed to sleep in the golden sunshine of a royal August afternoon. It was judiciously shaded by large oaks.

Lest the reader should pronounce this a paradox, let me hasten to add that these trees, although they attracted every wanton breeze, and imparted a gradeful tinkle to yard, lawn, and the deep piazzas, yet they were so far from the house itself that there was no danger of their boughs tapping like ghostly fingers against the windows, nor yet that for more disagreeable sound of the scraping of tree branches across the roof and eaves.

So the golden sunshine streamed clearly down on the old weather-beaten building. But in spite of this fact the house was a notably cool one on the hottest summer day.

Col. Lester loved trees, but he had a horror of the unwholesome damp and destructive mildew they caused if they grew caressingly near his dwelling.

On this particular afternoon every door and window was open, but the shutters were closed to keep out the sun and to let in the air. The large hall-door stood so widely open it seemed itself gasping for air, while the two doors on the left and right of the breezy hall also stood ajar.

It was two o'clock—two o'clock in the sunny South, at which hour all nature and all humanity seem to seek repose from the toil and heat of the day in this dolce far niente land.

The negro laborers slumbered peacefully under trees; the mules rolled and wallowed luxuriously in the dust, or nodded sleepily over the feed troughs; the turkeys and chickens stood half aloof on one leg under the houses; the peacocks and guineas did the same in silence. There was no sound in all the land except the drowsy hum of insects, the shrill chirp of the crickets in the grass, and the fretful, peevish cry of those speckled Arabs of the poultry-yard—Guineas.

Inez Lester had gone into the library to remove the water in the stand of flowers she every day placed on her father's desk. After her task was finished the soft coolness of the red and white striped hangings over wood her to slumber. Her father succeed comfortably in his wicker easy-chair, placed on the east end of the north piazza, with a large newspaper spread over his enfolded visage.

No one in his sense ever spoke or dresses for sessions on these hot summer days in Southland, till the fiery red orb of day marks 3 or 4 o'clock p. m. So Inez made a lovely picture, as she lay asleep on the comfortable lounge, with her lovely flowing sheer white wrapper draping her exquisite limbs.

Well, it was 2 o'clock when the sound of leisurely footsteps could have been heard on the front walk—could have been heard had any one been awake to hear them, we must add.

But the house slept on like an enchanted castle, and even the lazy hounds scattered over yard and piazzas did not so much as open their sleepy eyes when a muscular masculine hand struck the hall-door with vigorous knuckles.

The knock was repeated, but elicited no response. Noting the hospitably open doors, the stranger boldly entered, and unfortunately walked into the room on his left. Had he gone into the room on his right, he would have done the correct thing. It certainly looked invitingly cool, with its furniture upholstered in cretonne—a creamy ground, lightly sprinkled with roses rosebuds and delicate green leaves—and was most evidently the parlor.

But chance led him to the library where Inez lay sleeping on the broad red and white stripes which covered her resting place, and which corresponded with curtains and chairs. He paused on the threshold, discreetly, and in his embarrassment coughed slightly. Immediately, Inez opened her heavy-lidded eyes, and at the sight of that unknown figure framed in the doorway, she started up, every faculty alert.

"Who are you, sir?" she demanded, haughtily.

"Carl Vogel, at your service," the gentleman bowed.

"Sir, you are no gentleman to thus intrude into a lady's presence.

"My dear young lady, I thought I was expected. I am the artist whom your father invited from the city of New York to paint your lovely portrait."

He did not really know if she were the one whose portrait he was to paint; but, astute man, he had long ago learned that delicate flattery is never wasted on "fair women."

Inez graciously relented and accepted his card.

"I beg your pardon, and will call gaps at once. But we were mistaken in the day and hour. Papa said you would come to-morrow at 10 o'clock."

"Which I intended, but finding a pic-picture scenner than I anticipated, I ran away from all other engagements, for I needed the recreation of a country life.

"If you will be so kind as to sit down, and—excuse me," and deeply embarrassed, but not revealing it by walk or manner, Inez left the room in quest of her father. "That he should see me in this wrapper," was her mortified thought, quite unconscious that Carl, as an artist, must certainly admire her more in that garb than if she were habited in "full dress." But being a woman, she could not, or would not, lay the balm of this soothing knowledge to her harrowed soul.

When Col. Lester entered a few moments after, Carl Vogel was welcomed in a more hospitable manner than Inez had accorded him.

"Everybody and everything goes to sleep in the South during the early dinner, and no doubt after you have been accustomed to as you will easily fall into our indolent ways. You mention the 'city' as if it were but a step away, but you will specdily discover that New York and its customs are further away than you seem to think. Yes, I had taken a fancy to Inez' portrait I hopeful painted, and as you mentioned your intention of taking a sketching tour through the South when I was in your studio last spring, I was quite determined to have you stop with us several weeks. I regret that our welcome has seemed so cheerless, but we did not expect you till to-morrow."

"My mistake, I guess. I was longing to get away from New York—in fact, I have painted later in the summer than is my habit, and I was ill in the early spring, and so was longer in finishing Mr. Wolfe's pictures than I thought I should be."

"Yes? Well, now you are here you must rest, and take your time over Inez' picture. You will find her a quite willful, but a little judicious flattery always brings a woman round;" and Col. Lester's mellow laugh seemed to set all the slight ornaments in the room to jingling.

"That is a very fine painting," observed the artist walking up to a coral landscape piece.

"Yes," and a father's pride spoke out in the voice; "my daughter's."

"Indeed!" and the young man turned quickly about and gazed at Col. Lester as if he did not more than half believe this statement.

"Yes, poor girl, it was once her greatest joy."

Carl Vogel was all attention. Happy faced Inez did not seem to be one with unsolaced grief, as her father's words seemed to suggest. But Col. Lester pursued the subject no further, hastily adding:

"Excuse me for forgetting that you must be hot, tired and dusty, and allow me to show you to your room at once."

And he preceded his guest out of the library, who obediently followed till they came to a door lower down in the hall which led to a room directly behind the parlor.

A girlish figure, clad in fresh flowing muslin, and with some folded towels over her arm came out of the door as they reached it. She nodded brightly to her father, but did not have passed on without notice of the stranger had not Col. Lester stopped her and said, "My daughter Inez, Mr. Vogel," and then Inez put out a thin soft hand with true Southern grace, and gave Carl a welcoming look and smile. Then she vanished into a room across the hall. Carl gazed dreamily after her a moment, then suddenly roused himself and followed Col. Lester into his apartment, who left him there.

The furniture was of China wood, beautifully carved, and with that lovely mingling of colors only found in this peculiar wood. The matting on the floor was white, the chairs covered with cool gray Holland.

"These Southerners certainly understand the art of furnishing rooms for their climate," he murmured, pushing back a lace curtain, and opening the blinds of a window.

A knock at his door announced his luggage, also the advent of a respectful servant.

"Please, sah, Mahar says will you come jiter dey dinin'-room soon's yo' ready."

"Certainly, but how am I to find the dining-room?" Carl pleasantly asked.

"I gwine show ye dey way?" the man affirmed, and in a few minutes Carl ventured out, freed from the dust of travel, and attired in fresh linen.

Down the inevitable hall, across a breezy passage, and Sam opened another door. Col. Lester turned away from a window and came to meet his guest.

This was the dining-room. The floor was stained a rich walnut, and rose-colored shades at the windows and in halls a delightful glow, and made the snowy damask, white china and cut glassream and sparkle as if inviting a cordial as the owner's.

A pale, quiet-looking lady rose from a chair and Col. Lester introduced, "My wife." Mrs. Lester retained her guest's hand and led him to the table. Inez came in just then with a bunch of white roses which she arranged on Carl's lunch-table—after which Carl made a satisfying lunch—a repast satisfactory to his taste and to his artist's eyes.

Inez' portrait did not progress very rapidly, owing to that erratic young lady's different moods and tenses, and so one day, a week after Carl's arrival, Mrs. Lester entered the library where he painted, with a dainty lunch basket on her arm. "Inez, dear, Mary tells me Francis is not well. If Mr. Vogel can dispense with you for a few hours, I should like for you to go over and see her. Here are some grapes and other things for the poor girl, and do try to persuade her to come back with you."

Mr. Vogel glanced up interestedly, then going on with mixing some paint, he said, "I have no doubt Miss Inez is tired and will be glad for a walk."

"But sister lives five miles away, and I am no champion Englishwoman. I don't propose to walk that distance," Inez retorted, saucily.

"There is no need," reassured Mrs. Lester. "Tom has the phaeton and pony at the door."

"And can't I take Tom's place as driver?" smiling, she pleaded. Carl, arranging up, for he had learned that Tom was Inez' Lilliputian groom and driver.

"Can you drive?" questioned Inez, gazing at him doubtingly.

"Only try me," he confidently reproved.

"Oh, well, if you can't, I can; so run away and wash your hands." Inez hospitably commanded.

He did drive admirably. Inez discovered to her chagrin at the ride, and her sent with a feeling of safety she had not felt on leaving home. But Carl also drove leisurely, so that it was an hour and a half before they reached Francis' cottage, nestling amid an acreage of clamboring vines and closely crowding trees.

The house was not carefully kept—the man's part of keeping a house in repair, I should explain—but the cotton fields bore evidence of careful tillage.

The dwelling had five or six rooms, evidently, and all somewhat disconnected, for all had doors opening into a wide entrance-way, left unincloased at either end.

A lady—plainly a lady, in spite of her faded calico dress—came out into the entrance to meet Carl and Inez.

"My sister, Mrs. Strathmore—Mr. Vogel, from New York."

It was the first time Inez had mentioned her sister's name, and Carl, to conceal his astonishment, bowed low over the slender hand held out to him.

Neither the Colonel, Mrs. Lester, nor Inez had ever before mentioned the existence of this daughter and sister.

They went into a room devoid of carpet or luxurious furniture—only a few good paintings on the walls, indicated taste or wealth.

"Great heavens!" he saw this woman be the daughter of Col. Lester and sister to the lovely Inez? Carl unwittingly exclaimed, as he took the wicker chair pointed out to him by his hostess. Inez observed his flushed face and heard the lame and entreating messages from her mother. Mrs Strathmore sat with the basket in her lap, and a sad smile curving her lips.

"But you know, Inez, I can not leave Fred."

Inez shrugged her shoulders impatiently and palpably reprimed a more imperious gesticulation.

"Well, what are you doing with yourself now? We heard you were ill."

"No, I am not ill—only the hot weather tires me, and I am trying to make myself a useful woman by saving for the hands," lifting her eyes, with a strange amusement gleaming in them, and Carl new discovered them to be most beautiful eyes—brown and pathetic, and yet—spite unlike Inez' brilliant blue orbs, which the latter were very pretty eyes, indeed.

After an hour, Inez declared she must go, at the same time admiring Francis for refusing to accompany them.

"You are a cold-hearted, insidious woman, and, I verily believe, do not care to come home any more."

Francis made no reply to this remonstrance, but Carl heard her draw in her breath sharply, as if in pain, or as if it cost her a great effort to remain her self-centred; but her only answer was that she will little smile it struck one's heart to see.

Then Inez kissed her sister passionately, and hurried away saying Carl to make his adieu in a more sedate fashion.

He stood on the second step, she above him, and when he stretched out his hand she had a fleeting pain within it. At that touch he seemed to feel an electric shock thrill him, and as she looked at him, with tender, troubled eyes, he seemed to read her soul, and the knowledge came to him that this woman had suffered and was suffering some inexplicable anguish.

"If she were well and happy, she would be gloriously beautiful!" The swift thought flashed across his brain, for, after a prolonged but stealthy survey, he had revoked his first opinion of her, which was that she was a commonplace, faded woman of little intellect.

After that one hour's association he knew her to be a genius, with a gifted mind and disciplined heart. But there was a blight upon her life—what, he had yet to learn.

Inez was in the phaeton when he reached it, her veil down for dress.

She did not speak when he addressed her, and, as he turned the horse's head homeward, he was amazed to hear sobs behind the veil. After a few moments they subsided, and Inez fluttered:

"Forgive me—pray forgive my exhibition of weakness; but—my poor sister!"

Carl was respectfully attentive.

"I must tell you more about her, for I know you must think so strangely of her—perhaps you mistake her. Seven years ago she married Fred Strathmore. He is well enough off to keep her in ease, but, instead, every sogro on the place is pressed into the fields, for cotton is Fred's king. Francis cooks, washes, and irons, and never complains. She has nothing to wear but calico, although Fred has plenty of gold. He can no more appreciate the beauties of her mind and character than he could do a bit of fine sculpture. She allows none of us to help her, and her pitiful little garden, orchard, and flowers are cultivated by her own hands. She is an artist—all those pictures you saw she painted; but Fred cares not them, and says if she were to sow, or do something else useful, she would be of some account. She does all the sewing for Fred's laborers, as it is paid for out of their wages, and saves no so much money. Why she married him I can't explain—some of us can, but the fact remains—she married him.

"He is not a polished man; he can't be, for his whole soul is bound up in money getting and saving. He plants nothing but cotton and corn—this he does not believe in orchards or vegets than—he is for women, he says. Francis has not painted a picture for four years—she is just 25 and but four years older than I. She says she will never paint again."

All this was very impudent in impulsive Inez, who was a girl of variable moods, and just now the spirit possessed her to disclose to this stranger the sad story of her mismated sister. Carl also—that is great modesty—and at an hour and a half before they reached home, Inez had unfolded to him the history of laboring vines and closely crowding trees.

The house was not carefully kept—the man's part of keeping a house in repair, I should explain—but the cotton fields bore evidence of careful tillage.

The dwelling had five or six rooms, evidently, and all somewhat disconnected, for all had doors opening into a wide entrance-way, left unincloased at either end.

A lady—plainly a lady, in spite of her faded calico dress—came out into the entrance to meet Carl and Inez.

"My sister, Mrs. Strathmore—Mr. Vogel, from New York."

It was the first time Inez had mentioned her sister's name, and Carl, to conceal his astonishment, bowed low over the slender hand held out to him.

Neither the Colonel, Mrs. Lester, nor Inez had ever before mentioned the existence of this daughter and sister.

They went into a room devoid of carpet or luxurious furniture—only a few good paintings on the walls, indicated taste or wealth.

"Great heavens!" he saw this woman be the daughter of Col. Lester and sister to the lovely Inez? Carl unwittingly exclaimed, as he took the wicker chair pointed out to him by his hostess. Inez observed his flushed face and heard the lame and entreating messages from her mother. Mrs Strathmore sat with the basket in her lap, and a sad smile curving her lips.

"But you know, Inez, I can not leave Fred."

Inez shrugged her shoulders impatiently and palpably reprimed a more imperious gesticulation.

"Well, what are you doing with yourself now? We heard you were ill."

"No, I am not ill—only the hot weather tires me, and I am trying to make myself a useful woman by saving for the hands," lifting her eyes, with a strange amusement gleaming in them, and Carl new discovered them to be most beautiful eyes—brown and pathetic, and yet—spite unlike Inez' brilliant blue orbs, which the latter were very pretty eyes, indeed.

After an hour, Inez declared she must go, at the same time admiring Francis for refusing to accompany them.

"You are a cold-hearted, insidious woman, and, I verily believe, do not care to come home any more."

Francis made no reply to this remonstrance, but Carl heard her draw in her breath sharply, as if in pain, or as if it cost her a great effort to remain her self-centred; but her only answer was that she will little smile it struck one's heart to see.

Then Inez kissed her sister passionately, and hurried away saying Carl to make his adieu in a more sedate fashion.

He stood on the second step, she above him, and when he stretched out his hand she had a fleeting pain within it. At that touch he seemed to feel an electric shock thrill him, and as she looked at him, with tender, troubled eyes, he seemed to read her soul, and the knowledge came to him that this woman had suffered and was suffering some inexplicable anguish.

"If she were well and happy, she would be gloriously beautiful!" The swift thought flashed across his brain, for, after a prolonged but stealthy survey, he had revoked his first opinion of her, which was that she was a commonplace, faded woman of little intellect.

After that one hour's association he knew her to be a genius, with a gifted mind and disciplined heart. But there was a blight upon her life—what, he had yet to learn.

Inez was in the phaeton when he reached it, her veil down for dress.

She did not speak when he addressed her, and, as he turned the horse's head homeward, he was amazed to hear sobs behind the veil. After a few moments they subsided, and Inez fluttered:

"Forgive me—pray forgive my exhibition of weakness; but—my poor sister!"

Carl was respectfully attentive.

"I must tell you more about her, for I know you must think so strangely of her—perhaps you mistake her. Seven years ago she married Fred Strathmore. He is well enough off to keep her in ease, but, instead, every sogro on the place is pressed into the fields, for cotton is Fred's king. Francis cooks, washes, and irons, and never complains. She has nothing to wear but calico, although Fred has plenty of gold. He can no more appreciate the

THREE MEN LYNCHED.

The Jellerson Murderers Shot and Hanged at Audubon, Iowa, by Masked Men.

A Desperate Resistance Made by Wilson and Smythe—Clerro Jellerson Submits Meekly.

[Audubon (Iowa) special.]

Early this morning a mob hitched Jed J. Wilson, John A. Smythe, and Clerro B. Jellerson, confined in the County Jail awaiting trial for hanging Hiram J. Jellerson, on April 30 last.

The Deputy Sheriff Judge Tuttleman received a change of venue from Judge Thorkelson, of Independence, and had arrived with his prisoners at Audubon. The mob was composed of people in such an evident state of a desperate character that they were unanimously tried and cannot accomplish their purpose, and demanded the keys of the jail. The sheriff refused, and endeavored to alarm the town by firing his pistol by twice of his stationing outposts to prevent the escape of the prisoners. The mob, however, had assembled with quite a small crowd to see the fun, and speedily had overpowered the sheriff and his deputy, and had taken a tool which would soon pass any door in the jail, and had set to work to force the door. They were quite a long time at that, for the door was made of the best material, and the men had to work in the dark, for the sheriff had put out the lights. Finally, however, they succeeded in forcing the door, and then they had to work through the iron cage which was built around the door, and which

LAST HOURS OF GREAT MEN.

Anecdotes of the Last Days of John Randolph, Jackson and Jefferson.

The last days of John Randolph, of Roanoke, are full of pathos. He thought he was dying for years before he did so, and when he was asked how he was he would reply "Dying! dying! dying!" Once when he was at Washington he was very low, and his friends in congress thought he could not live but a few hours. At one time they left him for a while when he seemed a little better than usual, and went to the capitol. They had been there but a short time when Randolph burst into the senate and made a fiery speech, which he supposed would be his last. At another time he came out of his sick chamber into the senate to hear Clay speak, and shook hands with him at the close, testifying his friendship for him, notwithstanding the duel which they had formerly fought. Randolph was insane during a part of his life, and an opium-eater during his last days. He was tyrannical and dictatorial until the last, and he fought with his doctor on his death-bed over the pronunciation of certain words. His death occurred in a Philadelphia hotel. A few minutes before he died the doctor wanted to leave him, but Randolph objected, and his slave took the key, locked the door, and put the key in his pocket. With his last words Randolph declared that he wanted his slave set free, and he kept the doctor there as a witness of his dying declaration. A skeptic through life, he appreciated his condition on his death-bed, and among his last words were "remorse." He was lying perfectly quiet, with his eyes closed, when he suddenly roused up, and screamed out in an agitated voice, "Remorse! remorse! remorse!" He then cried out, "Let me see the word! Get a dictionary! Let me see the word!"

There was no dictionary at hand, and he was told so. He exclaimed: "Write it there! Let me see the word!" The doctor picked up one of his cards labeled "Randolph of Roanoke." "Shall I write it on this?" "Yes; nothing more proper," was Randolph's reply. The word remorse was written on it in pencil and handed to him. He looked at it a moment with great intensity, "Write it on the back," he exclaimed. It was done, and handed him again. He looked at it with his blazing eyes. "Remorse!" he said, "you can have no idea of it whatever; it has brought me to my present situation—but I have looked to Jesus Christ and I hope to obtain pardon." He then made the doctor to draw a line under the word and told him to keep the card. A short time after this his keen eye began to dull, his powerful mind to give way, and within two hours he died. His body was taken to Virginia and buried on his estate at Roanoke.

In a late letter I told you something of the last days of the presidents, but I omitted to say much as to their deaths. We have preserved the last words of some of them. John Adams and Thomas Jefferson both died on the same day, and that the 4th of July, 1826. They were friends during their latter years, and Adams' last words were, "Thomas Jefferson still lives," but history shows that he was mistaken. Jefferson died an hour before, exclaiming: "Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace," and "I resign my soul to God—and my daughter to my country." John Quincy Adams spoke his last words in the capitol at Washington, saying, "This is the end of earth. I am content." and Gen. Harrison, who died in the white house, said: "Sir, I wish you to understand the principles of government. I wish them carried out. I ask nothing more."

Garfield's last reported words, as he lay racked by his terrible wound, were, "Oh, that pain!" But Lincoln became unconscious when he was shot, and expired so till he died. George Washington was same during his last hours, and he spent them in calmly arranging his affairs. He told his wife to bring two wills which he had made, and to burn one of them. He then grasped his pulse with one hand and counted the beats until he dropped back dead. Washington died of a cold. Talk of the cholera, Andrew Johnson of paralysis, and Gen. Harrison of cold, pleurisy, and cholera mortus.

President Jackson was for thirty-one years a diseased man, and the latter part of his life was spent in almost continuous pain. Even on his death-bed he was tortured by office-seekers. "I am dying," said he, "as fast as I can, and they all know it; but they keep swarming about me in crowds, seeking for office—bargaining for office." His death-bed scene was a most affecting one. A half an hour before his death his children and friends were standing around his bedside, and his adopted son Andrew had taken his hand and whispered in his ear:

"Father, how do you feel? Do you know me?"

"Know you? Yes, I should know you all if I could see. Bring me my spectacles."

These were brought and put on him, and he said: "Where is my daughter and Marion? God will take care of you for me. I am my Father's. I belong to him. I go but a short time before you, and I want to meet you all, white and black, in heaven."

At this all burst into tears, and the general said: "What is the matter with you, my dear children? Have I alarmed you? Oh, don't cry. Be good children, and we will all meet in heaven."

These were Jackson's last words. A short time after this he passed peacefully away. He died a Christian and a Presbyterian.

Thomas Jefferson was more of a deist than anything else, and when he died he said he would be glad to see a preacher who called "was a good neighbor," thereby intimating that he did not care to see him professionally. There was no preacher present at Washington's death-bed, and there is doubt as to his belief. The two Adamses believed in Unitarian doctrines, and it is said that John Quincy Adams, during his last years, never went to sleep without repeating that little child's prayer:

"Now I lay me down to sleep,
I pray the Lord my soul to keep;
If I should die before I wake,
I pray the Lord my soul to take."

There is considerable doubt as to Lincoln's Christianity, but his best friends believe him to have been a believer. He was certainly a great bible reader, and understood it thoroughly. Frank Pierce was an episcopalian and a church member's form. Grant and Hayes attended the Methodist church while in the white house, and Garfield spent his Sundays at the chapel of the Disciples. John Tyler was, I think, a Presbyterian, though his second wife was a Catholic. Dolly Madison was an Episcopalian, whatever husband may have been, and the old church which she attended years ago still stands, and in it President Arthur worships to-day.—Cor. Cleveland Herald.

How the Canny Scot Invests.

"The canny Scot would have an investment company for mortgages at the north pole or at the head of the Congo river, if he found productive property there," said a representative of a Scotch syndicate, who handles millions of money annually in this country. "The Scotch frugality is encouraged by the proverb, 'The borrower ye always have with you,' and nothing is safer in this country, especially of the south and west, present such an attractive field for investment that there is no other line of business of equal security that presents the same opportunity for profit. The Scotch were the first to recognize the revival of industry in the south, and in the past five years they have invested millions thereupon realistic mortgages, always on the country. They believe in soil, not in bricks and mortar. An applicant for a city loan some time ago was told by a Scotch agent that all he could have was 20 per cent on the value of the ground on which his building stood. He protested that his building was worth five times as much as the land, and was insured in a first-class company. 'Ah,' answered the Scot, 'your building may burn tonight and the insurance company may fail to-morrow—then where would my security be?' This was conversation with a vengeance, and when the applicant expressed his disgust, the Scotchman said: 'Ah, weel, we disna come to America to lose our money.'

"Few investments have proved so fortunate for the Scotchmen as the mortgage upon southern farms. They organize an investment company on the other side with an authorized capital of $600,000, 20 per cent of which they pay in. Only first-class people, whose names invite confidence, are taken into this company, which, under the limited liability act, goes before the public with debentures bearing 3½ or 4 per cent interest, which they have authority to issue up to the limit of their authorized capital. They get $600,000 there very cheap, and they loan it out in the south and west at 10 per cent net, the borrower paying all expenses and commissions.

"What security is required?

"Productive lands under cultivation. The loan is based upon about 40 per cent of a conservative valuation in estimating which no account is made of improvements, fences, houses, or timber lands, but the greater security of all these are taken in. The borrower gives a deed of trust, and this is put on record before he receives the money. Then when the final certificate of the attorney is received all debts against the property are first paid from the amount of the loan, and the remainder is handed over to the borrower.

"What does the investor get as his evidence?

"A neat little packet of 10 per cent notes, signed by the borrowers in the presence of witnesses. These notes represent the interest as it becomes due, and the principal is represented by a series of notes of equal amount, one of which must be paid each year. The Scotchman's theory is that if you want a high rate of interest it is better to have the principal paid in installments, and that the borrower finds it easier to pay a most amount a year than to keep the accumulations intact for the maturity of the loan. The notes are collected by the agent of the investment company. The methods employed are so careful that in a large business involving millions there has not yet been a foreclosure. The investment company, after paying 4 per cent upon their debentures, have 6 per cent on $600,000 to add as dividends to the 10 per cent which the subscribed capital itself is drawing. It's as slick a business as man ever devised, and while the Republicans were fooling with one railroad the keener Scotchman seethed the farms of this country are the true basis of value, and they act accordingly."—New York Sun.

Sara Bernhardt's gorgeous imperial mantle, worn in Sardou's new play, "Theodora," is the talk of the hour in Paris. Though not so valuable as the original, which was said to be worth $600,000, the modern mantle cost $1,600 and is exactly copied from the famous portrait of the Empress of Ravenna. It is made in blue satin, bordered with gold and sown with peacocks having sapphire and emerald plumage and ruby eyes, and is worn by Theodora when visiting the hippodrome in state.

An Iowa Dogberry.

The new Attorney-General of Iowa tells the following of his first case in court. It was an action for damages on a warranty in a horse trade. He was attorney for the plaintiff. The trial was before "a well-known" settler, and "Esquire" in pioneer days, called "Dickie Miller." The defendant's attorney was a sprucy young fellow, who will be known as "Jim," but we will let the story go as Baker related it:

"I had but two law books in my office, the Code of Iowa and "Chitty on Contracts." In "Chitty" I found a case which covered exactly the points I wanted to make in my horse case, so I took the book along. "Dickie," the Esquire, and the defendant's lawyer came into the room together, and, as they did so, I saw a large bottle sticking out of "Jim's" pocket. In those days whisky was free as water, and did not cost as much as it does now. The trial was begun, and every little while Jim would go out behind the house, and in a moment after "Dickie" would follow. The testimony was put in, and I made my argument, with several interruptions while Jim and "Dickie" went outside. I cited Chitty for all he was worth, for by this time "Dickie" had got a little "tired." When I closed Jim straightened himself up, expectorated the superfluous "cotton," and picking up the volume of "Chitty," turned to the court, and said:

"Yer Honor, what kind of law is this fellow giving us? I supposed the courts of Iowa were ruled by the code of Iowa, but this fellow says—or, he says somebody out in England makes the laws for Iowa and for Yer Honor. Let's see who it is '[reading the title page] Robert Chitty, Barrister-at-law? I've heard of attorneys-at-law, but what's a barrister-at-law—yes, barrister-law, to make laws for courts in Iowa, for Yer Honor; let's see further who this Iowa law maker in England is; barrister-at-law, Westminster Hall, London. Exactly, a tavern keeper over in London, and to make laws for Iowa!' and down came the book, with a thud, on the table.

"He can't do it; by'd—n sight, Jim; case's yours."

Does not Security Aid Promptness?

Someone has contributed an article in the Banker's Magazine, who among other good things gets off the following: "When money in quantity can be had by the simple process of writing out a promissory note, without any necessity to pledge security or to ask a personal guarantor, or even to make explanations to the lender, it is scarcely in human nature to use money so obtained economically and carefully. And the want of economy and care introduced into business on a large scale can have but one result. There is many a poverty-stricken man to-day "loafing" about our cities in enforced idleness, who in all probability would have been on his feet had he not been able to borrow money so easily. The best friend that a borrower can have, is a lender who is careful of the amount he parts with and the security he lends upon.

With respect to loans without security which are negotiated in a legitimate way, there is a vast amount of false pride afloat in the community. Some people think that a sort of slight is inflicted upon them when they are asked for security, forgetting that the very act of borrowing puts them upon a dependent footing. The true pride in the case is that of a very rich mercantile firm, whom I once knew well. On the rare occasions when they found it necessary to borrow, it was their pride to be able to put down government securities as collateral. They were too proud to ask the banker to lend them money as a personal favor—a form of pride which might be imitated with advantage by many people whose vanity is greater than their means."

Beaver Island.

The weather still continues cold, with no indications of change. Snow is over three feet deep, and it is very hard to go from place to place.

We had but four mails since Dec. 19, 1884, but now that the ice is good we should have two a week. It looks, however, as though we would be left without any more till spring, for the postoffice department is only willing to pay a sum equal to two thirds of the amount of stamps cancelled at our office in each quarter. This arrangement will not pay for one mail during that time.

Some of the fishermen are catching a few trout, whitefish, and perch.

John Moale & Co. intend to ship their fresh fish on teams over to Harbor Springs on the ice, and from there to Chicago.

Isbell & Co., of Detroit, have filled with ice two large houses at St. James where they intend to do a fresh fish business in the spring. They also intend to have two tugs fishing gill nets.

Neil Gallagher and Charles Roe, both of Harbor Springs, were here about ten days.

Capt. Harrison Miller, of the lifesaving station, paid us a visit. He remained a few days, and returned home to Charlevoix last Saturday.

The board of supervisors issued last week a bond for $1,500, bearing ten per cent interest, and payable in four years. They called in that amount of county orders that were drawing seven per cent interest.

John Marvin, son of James Martin, was married to Miss Mary Roddy, daughter of Capt. Roddy, on Jan. 26.

Francis McCauley, a venerable and much-beloved citizen of our island, died on the 10th inst. at the residence of his son, Con. McCauley. He was eighty nine years old, and left five sons, two daughters, and forty-seven grandchildren to mourn his loss. Funeral services on the 12th were largely attended. Sermon by Rev. Wm. Longue.

John Gallup and M. H. Boyle are visiting at Harbor Springs and Charlevoix.

Burgess.

Yes verily, there is much snow in the land,—about three feet ten inches in this part of the vineyard.

Mrs. Solter, the postministress at Burgess, is on the sick list.

Mrs. I. S. Webster was over in Evangeline last week, visiting her daughter, Mrs. Long.

Mrs. Frank Kane is visiting her parents, Mr. and Mrs. Wilke, of Charlevoix.

E. N. Hale received a letter from his son in the south part of the state, saying that the snow is very deep there.

I. S. Webster has a letter from his father in-law in Ohio, that he is recovering from his recent serious illness.

Ezra Ferguson hauls a cord of shipping wood at a load from his place to Pine Lake, with one horse.

Mr. Tillotson's little girl is quite sick with lung fever.

Mrs. Zillah Gibson's baby is sick with a hard cold.

Tommy Scroggy is confined to the house with a cold.

We are having a few days of splendid weather, and can stand a good deal more of the same.

Miss Currie Wilks and Mr. Durance of Charlevoix are visiting at Frank Kane's.

One of the good citizens of Hayes has "skipped out."

Bay Springs.

"A little more moderate," is the weather song for the past few days.

The snow is so deep that very little lumbering is being done in the woods.

Russell Cadwell has bought the Sales farm, and Mr. Sales will move away in the spring.

Born—to M. V. Pierce and wife, Jan. 27, a daughter.

F. Bettis has moved into Delos Whaley's house. Mr. Whaley is in Alemba, Isabella county, and writes that times are pretty dull there.

The Bay Springs lyceum had a spirited discussion over the resolution that the North American Indian had more reason for complaint at the hands of the whites than the negro. It was decided that the negro had raised reason for complaint.

The "epizoot" has been through our village with a vengeance. Every family has suffered more or less from the attacks, and many were obliged to consult a physician. Some call it "a bad cold," but it is not.

Our school is having a vacation. It will open for the spring term next month.

H. B. Chapman is gaining a little in health. We hope to see him out soon in the full enjoyment of his old-time activity.

HORACE S. HARMAN,
Village Clerk.

Dated at Charlevoix, Feb. 25, A. D. 1885.

PROBATE ORDER FOR HEARING FINAL ACCOUNT.—State of Michigan, County of Charlevoix, ss. Probate Court for said County. At a session of the Probate Court for said County, held at the probate office in the village of Charlevoix, in said county, on the 9th day of February, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and eighty-five. Present, James Kent, Judge of Probate, in the matter of the estate of ISAAC STAFFORD, an incompetent person.

Henry H. Vanneuman, guardian of said estate, comes into said court and represents that he is now prepared to render his final account as such guardian, and that it may be ordered, that Monday, the second day of March next, at two o'clock in the afternoon, be assigned for examining and allowing such account, and that the several persons interested in said estate are required to appear at a session of said court, then to be holden at the probate office in the village of Charlevoix, in said county, and show cause if any there be, why the said account should not be allowed. And it is further ordered, that said guardian give notice to the persons interested in said estate, of the pendency of said account, and of the hearing thereof, by causing a copy of this order to be published in THE CHARLEVOIX JOURNAL, a newspaper printed and circulated in said county, three successive weeks previous to said day of hearing.

A true copy.

JAMES A. KEAT,
Judge of Probate.

WHEREAS, default has been made in the payment of the money secured by a mortgage dated the nineteenth day of October, A. D. 1882, executed by Michael Dooney to Samuel A. Gibson, of Charlevoix, Michigan, to Samuel A. Gibson, of Charlevoix, Michigan, which mortgage was recorded in the office of the register of deeds of the County of Charlevoix, in liber "A" of mortgages, on page 243, on the 24th day of October, A. D. 1882, at 8 o'clock a. m. And whereas, there is now claimed to be due on said mortgage at the date of this notice the sum of $850, one hundred dollars of the principal money and interest, and which by the terms of said mortgage is claimed to be unpaid, and no suit nor proceeding having been instituted at law to recover the debt now remaining secured by said mortgage, or any part thereof, whereby the power of sale contained in said mortgage has become operative. Now, therefore, notice is hereby given that by virtue of the said power of sale, and in pursuance of the statute in such case made and provided, the said premises will be foreclosed by a sale of the premises thereby described, at public auction, at the Village Hall, in the village of Lewis Bull, in the village of Charlevoix, in said county of Charlevoix, Michigan, the place where the Circuit Court for the county of Charlevoix is held, on the third day of April, 1885, at two o'clock in the forenoon of that day, which said premises are described in said mortgage as follows, viz: Lots one (1), two (2), three (3), and four (4), in block one (1), of Welch and Bullard's addition to the village of Charlevoix, according to the recorded plat thereof.

Dated at Charlevoix, Michigan, this 4th day of January, A. D. 1885.

SAMUEL A. GIBSON, Mortgagee.
ROBERT W. KANE, Agent.

SHERIFF SALE.—State of Michigan, County of Charlevoix, ss.—Notice is hereby given that in pursuance of a writ of fieri facias issued out of the Circuit Court for the County of Charlevoix, in favor of Frederick B. Jackson, and against the goods and chattels and real estate of William Conden, in said county, to me directed and delivered, I did upon the ninth day of December, A. D. 1884, at 9 o'clock a. m. take all the right, title, and interest of the said William H. Condon in and to the following described real estate, viz: All of the sawmill, all that certain piece or parcel of land situated in the County of Charlevoix, and State of Michigan, and more particularly described as follows: Commencing at a point on the beach of Lake Michigan, in the County of Charlevoix, at the south and westerly quarter line of section thirty-two (32), in township thirty-four (34) north, of range six (6) west, intersects said beach, thence south forty-eight degrees east along said beach seven and twenty four hundredths chains, thence south thirty degrees east four chains, thence south forty-nine chains to a stake, thence north forty-one degrees and seven tenths chains to a stake on the said south and south-quarter line of said section thirty-two, thence north along said quarter line seven and twenty-nine hundredths chains to the place of beginning, containing six acres of land, more or less, with all appurtenances thereunto belonging. All of which I shall expose for sale at public auction or vendue, to the highest bidder, at the front door of the village hall, in the village of Charlevoix, that being the place for holding the Circuit Court for the said County of Charlevoix, on the 4th day of April next, at one o'clock in the afternoon of that day.

Dated this 19th day of February, A. D. 1885.

The Hampton sensation and investigation seems to have subsided. Chairman Campbell says that he is only waiting developments. But the friends of Mr. Hampton are confident in their assertions that nothing will ever come of it. It is evident that the question to which Mr. Egan arose was not one of privilege and should not have been recognized as such, by the speaker. President Battors, of the senate, dealt very summarily with Jay Hubbell's alleged question of privilege. The libel suit which Mr. Egan threatened, in the absence of a legislative investigation, is being awaited. Doubtless his question of privilege will not soon be heard from.—[Detroit Journal.

Circuit Court Proceedings.

The first term of court in the new court-room convened on Tuesday and is now in session. The following is a synopsis of the court journal up to noon to-day:

The People v. S. M. Hoss; bastardy. On motion set aside and dismissed.

The People v. Wm. Smith; assault and battery. Settled.

Martin v. Beach; assumpsit. Judgment for plaintiff $85, each party paying their own costs.

Glenn v. Sommerville. Jury now out.

Jacobson et al. v. Moore et al.; assumpsit. Judgment for plaintiff $223.43 and costs.

Furge vs. Gessler et al. Judgment for plaintiff. $283.77 and costs.

In the matter of the estate of W. T. Adkin, insolvent, sale and conveyance by Fred H. Aldrich receiver; confirmed.

Lima Machine Works v. Adkin et al.; bill for appointment of a receiver. Ordered that Chas. R. Dunmore may appear and file answer.

Mills v. Gibson; replevin. Goods and chattels returned to defendant.

Drake v. Drake; divorce. Granted.

Holty v. Upright et al.; bill to quiet title. Demurrer submitted.

DEPUTY CLERK.

The appointment of Louis Widekind as deputy clerk was approved by the court.

SPECIAL ORDER.

In the matter of time for serving notes of issue: A note of issue in each civil cause in this court shall be served on the clerk by the party noticing such cause for trial at least ten days before the first day of the term at which such cause shall have been noticed for trial; that the clerk cause not less than forty copies of the trial docket to be printed at least five days before the first day of term, and that he print one copy to the Circuit Judge, and one copy to each of the attorneys or law firm firms appearing by said docket to have business in said court.

Place them Around.

While the brethren of the press in this region are at it, let them pass around the Call Publishing Company, of Chicago, as dead beats of the first water. It will also be well if one F. W. Boyne City Bits.

From the Tradesman.

WM. J. Lewis' new opera house is the pride of the town, and a genuine convenience.

Boyne City dealers have about 6,000 cords of four foot shipping wood, in readiness for shipment to Chicago and Milwaukee as soon as navigation opens.

A. J. Beardsley, a pioneer merchant of this place, but for the past four years out of trade, will shortly begin operations on a two story brick building, 26x70 feet in dimensions, the ground floor of which will be occupied by the owner with a dry goods and boot and shoe stock. The building will be completed about June 1.

Boyne City operators have orders from Chicago and Detroit parties for 3,500,000 feet of maple lumber and are using every exertion to get in that amount of logs before the snow leaves.

Real Estate Transfers.

The following is a list of transfers of real estate in Charlevoix county, for the week ending Tuesday evening, Feb. 24, 1885, as recorded in the office of the register of deeds:

ARAB LOVE SONG.

BY EUGENE HERBERT PIERSON.

The love fire glitter in the sky,
The earth is filled with dreamy light,
O, come to me, for I am nigh,
Oh, come to me, my soul's delight!

The earth is filled with dreamy light,
The night wind scatters odors sweet,
Oh, come to me, my soul's delight!
Lo! I am waiting at the feet!

The night wind scatters odors sweet,
It wakes the slumber-laden flowers,
Lo! I am waiting at the feet—
Oh, leave the sombre-scented bowers!

It wakes the slumber-laden flowers,
The nightingale breaks forth in song,
Oh, leave the sombre-scented bowers,
My love, why tarrest thou so long?

The nightingale breaks forth in song,
The moon sails slowly along the gale,
My love, why tarrest thou so long?
When they awake will thou still wait?

The moon sails slowly along the gale,
The sister is sweeter, red and white,
When they awake will thou still wait?
Oh, come to me, my soul's delight!

No Murderer.

BY LILY M. CURRY.

"You will have trouble yet with that fellow," said Tom, hoarsively.

I shook the ashes from my cigar—a first-class article which one night been enjoyed under almost any circumstances. Then I answered, slowly:

"I'e no doubt of it."

"Of course I agreed with Tom; he had been in that region before and knew the ways of the inhabitants.

But Tom had ceased smoking, and was looking grave.

"You will leave trouble," he pleaded. "I hate to have you here, Jack."

"Hah!" I laughed. "Haven't I a pair of six-shooters in my trunk there?"

"Get them out of your trunk," he suggested. "Keep them handy."

"And I am a pretty good shot, don't you think?"

"In a shooting-gallery, you bone. It is different when somebody gets the drop on you."

We were silent for a time; Tom appeared contemplative. I imagined his best thoughts were "my home," just at that moment, where a certain fair face awaited his return. In any event, he was not in love with Texas.

We had come South a few weeks previous as promoters of a new railroad. We were temporarily located in a small town half-way between the Brazos and the Colorado, and not far from the coastal. Here we had fitted up as our office and bachelor apartments a couple of pleasant rooms in the second story of a new brick building a short distance from the railroad station, and as yet no tragic had result d.

But Tom (surname Phillips, mine Lester), my closest friend, my counsel in business and pleasure, was actually ill at ease. He was going to Austin the following morning to remain several days, leaving me at home to manage all affairs and guard carefully the documents of the corporation.

So far, well and good. But I, on my part, had been unfortunate enough that very afternoon to incur the displeasure of a certain fiery temper-ed native, who was said to shoot with as few compunctions as he would feel to cut his dinner—or something of the sort. This nature, "Major" Dawson by name, had been anxious for some time to furnish us, at—as he claimed—the lowest figure, with such supplies—mules for one thing—as we should shortly need for actual work in opening up our new road. We had concluded to buy of him; the trade had all but been completed, when, by purest chance, I had discovered that he was going to swindle us unmercifully. We had gone to consult Tom, who happened to be absent. I had sent down to Dawson's store, a few squares distant, asking him to come up at once. And we in fact appeared. I had confronted him with my knowledge of his intentions. Of course he denied it up and down, but I had the proofs, and was not to be deceived.

"It is no matter," I had said; "you may count the trade off. We don't propose to be cheated."

He had sprung—his feet, making a quick motion, as if to draw some weapon. Then suddenly he had seemed to reconsider. With an oath and a threat that we should not get out of it so easily, he had left the place.

It was now evening, and Tom having returned, I had been telling him the circumstances.

"Suppose," he said, presently, "suppose you go to Austin. I've heard a good deal about Dawson. They say he's quick on the trigger; you know, and he mightn't very well kill you if you weren't there."

"Not any," I replied. "What kind of a fellow do you think me, any way? Make losses and leave you to settle them? No, you'll want in the morning as you intended. And I'll keep on the lookout for the 'Major.'"

Tom continued me, however, at some length, concerning the "Major's" accomplishments as a gunner.

I was not especially nervous the following day, but went about my business as usual, until the afternoon, when it seemed a friend of his over, to urge me if I could proceed to "hunt out of that range." Without a moment's hesitation I sent back word that we proposed to do at only with people who were "gentlemen."

Half an hour later I met the "Major" on the main street of the town. He stopped me and respoke the subject. Presently he grew excited in a high degree, and declared that no man should call him a coward and a liar and still live.

"You'll eat your words or die!" he cried finally, rolling out a big oath to attestation the fiend.

I was seized with a desire to laugh, it seemed so absurd. But I knew that would only aggravate matters.

"I've no time to argue," I said, "you might as well let the matter drop. I don't propose to quarrel with you; I'm not killing people just now; I'm no murderer."

I went home then.

Somehow I felt strangely lonesome when evening had come, and I went off alone to the hotel where Tom and I took our meals.

As I sat eating my supper, a dispatch was brought from Tom asking me to follow by the first train, my presence in Austin being highly important.

Before leaving the hotel, I made some inquiries, and found, as I had thought, there was an accommodation due at 8 o'clock, or a few minutes later. I determined to take this, not wait until 11 the following morning.

As I left the office, I met the fiery "Major" just entering. He glared at me like wild beast. I could hardly understand my one's working up such a state of deadly hatred on such short notice. Nevertheless, it was quite apparent how he felt.

I went home and put together some papers to take with me, placing all notes of importance carefully in my trunk. To this I added a few things, using to feel relieved at getting away from the town for a day or two. As Tom had intimated, my shooting had not been done at wooden targets, and I had felt, forsooth, uncomfortable sensation at the thought of bloodshed. I felt keenly my inexperience in such road in my absence and see the folly of his ways. He was in a measure formidable. He was hot and sinewy, quick of sight and motion. In anger his face assumed an expression of malevolence far easier to remember than desire. He was, however, a man of certain respectability, possessed of some little property and influence. I had heard so much of his ways of that country, that I even imagined he might administer a good dose of cold lead to a stranger like myself, driver himself up to some friendly Justice of the Peace, and be instantly acquitted, on grounds of self-defense. I lowered the curtains of my windows, and, lighting the lamps, arranged a few articles to take on my journey. I felt a little nervous and a good deal angry. I remember that that some of the people over at the hotel had looked at me with curious interest. Like as not they were considering it possible they should meet next with me at a Coroner's inquest—subject, myself. Of course they had heard of the affair. This night all be imaginative on my part, but the chances were strong in the other direction.

The more I thought of it, the angrier I grew. A profane fool of a braggart to impose on me with unheadily airs and supplies more or less damaged; and because I objected, to tell me I should eat my words or die!

"Confound him!" I said, viciously. "I wouldn't mind discovering my 'tis the best man of the two, land to land, in good civilized fashion. I almost think I could finish him—some one of him. But to drag in those miserable pistols and gill blood—it's too much, that's all!"

The block in which we had our rooms was a new one, and as yet but partly occupied. Only one of the stores beneath was rented. In this was a kind of apothecary shop, where all sorts of curious drugs were kept. The stairway up from the street landed one in a narrow hall, on one side of which were our apartments; on the other side, were spooning rooms still vacant. The hall ran back to a rear stairway. On either side of the hall was a small closet, unfuel and water. At night the hall was lighted dimly by a lamp in a bracket screwed to the wall.

It was nearing 10 o'clock, and I was ready to start to the station, when I heard a step, or fancied I heard, a creaking sound in the hall. I listened; but all was still.

I went to the door and looked out. No one was in sight. I closed the door and went back, provoked at my own trepidation. Yet somehow I hesitated as to leaving the place.

I turned down the light and went to look out of the window. The street was still enough. The light from the store windows below was warm and cheery. I put my head further out and looked up and down the roof. No one was in sight; no human—but hitched to a post a few yards distant I saw a saddle horse which I had surely seen before. It was Dawson's! I could have sworn to the house; it was a peculiar-looking animal—white, with a mahogany mane and tail. By the aid of the starlight and my own keen eyes I grew positive, and where was Dawson? Skulking somewhere near, and eager to do me harm. I had a strange, uncomfortable sensation. It was so—a suspicion which rapidly increased to certain knowledge.

"You shall eat your words or die!" I could hear him threatening me again, and the thought was a chilly sort of comfort, I confess.

What he wanted the horse in waiting for, I could hardly comprehend, unless it was to escape, when once he had "settled" me.

I drew in my head and closed the window. I listened again; for again had come that creaking sound of stealthy footsteps.

I went and got one of my pistols, saw that it was all right, and, holding it firmly, opened the door into the hall this time quite suddenly.

No one in sight.

I noticed, however, that the door of one of the little closets was slightly ajar. It was the closet on the opposite side of the hall. Owing to the direction in which the door opened, any one hiding in the closet could not see me through the aperture, and yet was safe enough.

I closed my door softly, and proceeded, revolver in hand, to the closet on my own side, but the door was shut fast, and I considered, on turn my back to the possible locality of the enemy.

I paused to consider. Here was a comfortable prospect. I should have to postpone my departure from town until the following morning.

I heard the reverberation thunder ponderously into the town. I backed slowly up to my own door, reached one hand behind for the knob, and suddenly I felt a grand disgust at my own cowardice, a reckless desire to investigate that opposite closet.

I sprung forward with three long strides, snatched the door open, and fell against—Dawson!

I was quick enough to knock his weapon out of his hand.

Then we grappled.

In the struggle that followed we rolled out and over and over on the floor of the hall.

He was desperately vicious; I was viciously desperate. We choked and pounded one another for an indefinite space. Strangely enough, we made no noise.

I gained upon him, and presently was holding him down, with a firm grip of his throat. I knew it would not do to let him go; it did not occur to me to call for assistance. I only kept on pounding my fellow soundly, regardless of consequences.

"You coward!" I said, or thought, "Prowling around after dark! You shall eat your words or die! I'll make you! right, fair and square. I've a mind to do it anyhow, for—for—"

I lost a little of my grip on him then, and he struggled to his feet, unsubdued and more furious than ever. He began to back me along the hall toward the stairs. Intending, I could see, to fling me into the street. But two could play at that, I was quite sure. I let him feel my weakening in his grasp, until we were just at the head of the stairs. Then I relaxed suddenly, and he himself went over with all the force he had meant to thrust upon me.

Over he went, but, alas! he clutched at me and dragged me with him.

It was a terrible fall. I was stunned for a moment; then I felt a horrible sensation in my arm, and looked up just in time to see a pale face with wide, curious eyes peering down at us from the top

How Gun-cotton is Made.

It is not generally known that there but one place in the United States where gun-cotton is manufactured, but such is the case. This is at the torpedo station in Newport Harbor. In the manufacture of gun-cotton the best cotton waste and the strongest and purest nitric and sulphuric acids are used for the explosive. The cotton waste, after it has been manipicked for the purpose of removing the dirt and grit, is placed in boiling tanks, where it is allowed to remain for four hours. It is afterward subjected to a thorough washing and is rebolled. This operation removes all oily matter and leaves the cotton harsh and stiff. It is then dried in the rooms heated with the waste air from adrying box.

After undergoing this treatment the cotton rolls up into snarls and bunches, and in order that the acid may have a freer access to it it is passed through a shredder and converted into a fluffy state. It is afterward exposed in an air-tight box for several hours to a temperature of 200 degrees, which practically deprives it of all moisture. From the air-tight box it is removed to the dipping room, where there are iron troughs filled with one part nitric acid and two parts of sulphuric acid. Into these troughs the cotton is placed, one bundle at a time, and allowed to remain about ten minutes, long enough for it to be thoroughly soaked. The acid is hand-pressed from the cotton, which is then placed in covered earthen jars, where it remains twenty-four hours undergoing chemical transformation.

In view of the fact that much heat is evolved during the chemical reaction it is found necessary to place the jars in pots and surround them with flowing water, which serves to keep them cool. The cotton is now nitrated and is practically gun-cotton, but the acid, still mechanically held, must be wholly removed or it would be apt to quickly deteriorate and become extremely dangerous. The charges, therefore, are taken one by one and placed in an acid wringer and plunged into a large tub which is kept filled with running water, in which a large wheel is rapidly turned in order to subject the cotton to a thorough washing. This latter process is continued till no acid is perceptible to the taste. It is then subjected to a still further washing and boiling in an alkaline mixture, this being necessary to remove every trace of acid.

The cotton is now in long shreds and balls, which can be used or stored without danger, the processes of conversion and cleansing being completed, but for military use it must be put into a more compact form. For this purpose the gun-cotton in charges of 300 pounds is thrown into a pulping tub, where, mixed with water, it is ground by steel cutters into a fine pulp. The grinding and breaking up of the cellular tissue of the cotton has made it more or less dirty, and it is necessary, therefore, to expose it to frequent washings in the pouching tubs, from which after treating it with lime water to make the moisture slightly alkaline, it is drawn up into a large iron tank, where it is fed to the molds, which under a moderate pressure, press the water from the pulp and trim out cylinders of cotton about eight inches high and three and a half inches in diameter. These cylinders are then placed under a hydraulic press and subjected to a pressure of about 1,700 pounds to the square inch or about eight tons on each. The cylinders are pressed into hard cakes or disks, some two inches high and three and a half inches in diameter, with a specific gravity a little greater than water. They are then packed in boxes of fifty pounds each and kept in magazines for general use. Gun-cotton is, from its great explosive power and the conditions of safety attached to its storage, superior to any other known explosive for naval warfare.—New York Times.

A Going in a Queer Place.

An eminent clergyman, traveling in the east, wrote home a letter in which he quoted the passage of scripture about "the sound of a going in the tops of the mulberry trees." The typesetter, not very familiar with the bible, mistook the "going" for the word "gong." We could scarcely believe our eyes when we read about the sound of a gong in the top of the mulberry trees. We did not believe that it could have been possible that a man had climbed up into such a place with the familiar bottle instrument of music. If he had reached that elevated point with a gong, he would not have been able to pine himself well enough to strike it to any advantage. We felt disposed to pronounce the whole thing to be a lie, until we thought that it must have been a typographical error.

But what writer or speaker has not suffered from similar mistakes? Hon. Daniel S. Dickinson told us that he thought the typesetter had shortened his life by ten years. After what a man did really say has gone through three or four different hands the speaker would not recognize his own deliverances. We recently read in a Boston paper two columns of a sermon which ones or twice reminded us of something that we ourselves had said, when on finishing we looked up to the heading, and to our surprise found it our own. The process through which the sermon had gone had changed its entire texture. But faults are often charged on reporters and printers which belong really to the speaker or writer. If people realized how many inarticulate utterances come from the pulpit, platform, and forum, the reporter would be excused for occasional mistakes. If people knew how much infamous chirography comes to a newspaper office there would be more leniency for the printer who puts the gong in the top of the mulberry trees.—Dr. Talmage, in Frank Leslie's Sunday Magazine.

The Supreme Court of Tennessee has decided that a domestic canary bird is property and may be subject of larceny. The learned court was, of course, not ignorant of the law, the court erred as to the facts. Judging from his sad bachelor condition, Judge Cooper has never chased, at the bidding of fair damsel, the vagrant canary through field and forest. There are Benedicks on the bench, however, and some one of these ought to have known that there is not a bird or beast kept as a pet or for profit or use so absolutely lacking in the animus revertendi. We have suspected its small corpus of being moved and instigated by the devil. It is painful to see a learned court fully up in the law thus slipping up on a matter of fact.—*Memphis (Tenn.) The Chicago

AND THE

Charlevoix Journal

ONE YEAR

For $2.00

THE CHICAGO WEEKLY NEWS is now an eight-page, sixty-four-column paper. It is the largest "dollar weekly" in America. Its eight broad, long pages present each week a mass of carefully selected matter, containing much to suit each of the varying tastes of the family circle. Fine and famous stories are THE NEWS, complete as to details, yet concise in form. In addition with this the CHICAGO DAILY NEWS (member of the Associated Press) gives it facilities for news gathering unsurpassed by any journal in the country. Its MARKET REPORTS are specially complete and thoroughly trustworthy. Particular attention is given to agricultural and home matters. Every issue contains six CHARACTER STORIES, and a regular installment of an original story by some well-known English or American author, exclusively secured for the CHICAGO DAILY NEWS. Condensed notes on fashions, art, industries, literature, science, etc., etc., appear regularly.

Few papers in the country are so extensively quoted by the press of the land for its bright and humorous paragraphs as the Chicago Daily News. These are all reproduced in the WEEKLY NEWS. In its editorial expression the paper speaks from the standpoint of the intelligent newspaper journalist, throughout giving the temperate to support or condemn the questionable under the press of party allegiance. Mere partisan extremes are not like it; the farmer, mind and thoughtful of all parties will appreciate and value its candid statements of facts and conclusions, all calculated to qualify the reader for the formation of his own intelligent opinion. The political events of the year to come promise to assume such a character that a thoroughly truthful and impartial record becomes all-important rather than a partisan one, colored and perverted to individual liking.

In all its departments the CHICAGO WEEKLY NEWS aims to present an entertaining, impartial and satisfactory family newspaper of the very highest grade.

WHAT OLD SUBSCRIBERS SAY

When they Renew their Subscriptions.

William Chenery, Pontiac, Oakland county, Mich., says: "I think it is the best paper in America."

A Dark Mystery of Carroll County, Ga., Solved After Seventeen Years.

One of the unsolved mysteries of Carroll county, writes a Villa Rica, Ga., correspondent to the St. Louis Globe-Democrat, is the disappearance of Miss Mary Bagwell, over twenty years ago. She was the daughter of one of the most prominent farmers of this section, and as a petted child of fortune had been gratified in every whim. Suddenly she disappeared from the neighborhood in 1865. Her father shook his head silently and sadly whenever her name was mentioned, but had no explanation to offer. It was supposed by some that the girl had been crossed in some of her whims and had merely gone off on a visit. The lapse of time, however, and the mysterious sadness of Mr. Bagwell put this theory at rest. Finally the rumor got out that a wagoner, who knew Mary by sight, on his return from Atlanta, declared that he had seen her in one of the houses adjacent to McPherson barracks. Others, later, declared that they had caught a glimpse of such a face, but whenever these interested investigated the matter the echoes proved to be naught.

His years passed away with no word from Mary, but the bent figure and whitened hair of her father showed that he was falling beneath his load of grief. Five years, then ten, and it may be said that Mary was forgotten. Five more completed fifteen, and most of those who had known the playful girl were either dead or had moved away, or had their minds engaged with business affairs which shut out the past. Where ever abt Mr. Bagwell would hobble around, leaning heavily upon the stick, the bookeeper would simply remark: "He is looking for his child," and would then dismiss him from thought.

When seventeen years had passed by, a local sensation was created by the discovery which two little boys had made. On the farm of Mr. Bagwell, a little off the main road, there was a shaft over fifty feet deep, leading to an abandoned gold mine. While playing around the opening one of the boys fell in a little wave, and after getting over his frights he determined to go on an exploring expedition. Soon he came to his companion carrying a strip of faded red ribbon. The two then returned and found, first, one skeleton, and then two, and one of them picked up a peculiar piece of jewelry. The find was reported abroad, and intense excitement prevailed. A party of men organized, and with the coroner and physicians, entered the shaft. The examination developed the fact that one skeleton was that of a young woman and the other of a man in middle life.

Then arose the question, how came the ladies there, and why? The story of Mary Bagwell was at once revived. The faded red ribbon was identified by an old lady as one worn by the girl on the day before she disappeared. The piece of jewelry was recognized as a heirloom in the Bagwell family, and was known to have been in possession of Mary. Still, there was no cause why her body should have been found in such a place is this, and there was no clue to her companion. Just then a Massachusetts man, searching for a plantation, it was known in those is the friendship of the family that the girl had formed an attachment for one of her father's overseers. The man was forbidden the house, and so far as the community knew, had left the country, and inquiries were unexplained that the girl might be weaned from her strange infatuation. To the horror of the family, it was discovered that the girl had passed the period when her sins could be hidden, and that she would soon become a mother.

Alternat crazed by grief, her father became moody and morose. He made a vast to Atlanta, and on returning home after dark, detected a female figure standing by the deserted mine. Stealthily creeping up his blood froze as he beheld his daughter in the embrace of the black wretch. Indignation told the rest of the story. In a gropper with the seducer of his child the scoundrel was felled to one the spot, and the groans told the story of coming death. Filled with remorse, shame, and frenzy, the girl precipitated herself into the abyss below.

Finding in way home several hours later, Mr. Bagwell took his secret to himself. Fortunately the abandoned mine held its counsel, and it looked as if the old man would carry his horrible secret to the grave with him.

The result of the examination and the theories this affirmed was the arrest of the aged father for murder. The case was tried in the courts. It was felt by a local sensation was created by the discovery which two little boys had made. There were three ballots for United States Senator to hold session of the Illinois legislature at Springfield, Feb. 21, on the first ballot Logan received 103 votes and Morrison 95. On the second the votes were cast for Logan and 97 for Morrison. Logan received 101 votes on the third ballot and Morrison 98.

A dispatch from Portland, Ore., says: "There is great excitement over the Senatorial election at Salem, Ore. Night before last the joint convention of the legislature adjourned without electing a Senator on the sixty-eighth ballot. The customary forty days of the session having expired the Democrats declared that the Legislature was adjourned. The Republicans, however, having a majority of both houses, passed a resolution continuing the session. The Democrats were angry, and determined to caucus to spin the city in order to break the quorum of twelve Republicans. Saturday another joint session was held, at which but few of the Democrats were present. There was no quorum, but the Republicans proceeded to vote, and claim that a majority was sufficient to select a Senator. There was no result, however, the votes being widely scattered."

Governor Moody, of Oregon, thinks that he shall appoint successor to Senator Slater, but will not do so until next December, unless an extra session of Congress is summoned.

The Democratic State Convention of Michigan met at Ionia and nominated A. H. Morse, of Ionia, for Supreme Court Judge, and Charles R. Whitman, of Ypsilanti, for Regent of the University. The Greenback State Convention met at Lansing, and a telegraphic congress was made with the Democrats to nominate Moses W. Field for Regent, thus completing the fusion ticket.

A close observer of events at Springfield, Ill., says the Chicago Times, "Logan and Morrison can be renominated Senator. The gentleman believes that in case a unanimy comes Gov. Oglesby will appoint Milton Hay, of Springfield.

An account of the battle of Jan. 31 at Ain-Sheik, Wells, from the pen of Archibald Williams, the correspondent of the Cairo, is cabled from London. Mr. Williams says that the breaking of the square, which came so near being disastrous to the British, was caused by the overmotivation of Col. Burnaby, who gave an unauthorized order to charge. The cavalry were swept in X and the Arab forces then broke into the square. It was in this charge that Col. Burnaby was killed. After this action and the one near Tamai the wounded suffered from great heat and want of water. Mr. Williams' report is dated six weeks back. It criticises Gen. Wolseley's plan of campaign and predicts the retreat of Gen. Buller which has since taken place.

For Supreme Judge.

The gentleman whom the Democratic convention held at Bay City on Wednesday selected to present to the people as the candidate of the combined opposition for the high and important office of Supreme Judge is Major Allen B. Morse, of Ionia. A fitter nomination could not have been made.

Major Morse needs no introduction to the people of the state. For the last ten years he has been recognized as one of the leaders of the Michigan democracy. Although a representative of the younger members of the party, by sheer force of his brilliant talents, splendid judgment, unsullied character, and unselfish devotion to the cause of democracy, he long since took a commanding position in the councils of the party. Thoroughly democratic in his manners and sentiments, warm in his friendships, considerate in his political convictions, and bold and courageous in his expression of them, he is pre-eminently a man of the people. No corporation has a claim on him; no corporation can purchase a claim on him. His honesty is ingrained and adamantine; his fearlessness partakes of the unquaking quality which ever distinguishes a man of superior mental force and power.

In his chosen profession of the law, Major Morse has taken a very high standing. As an advocate he is the peer of any member of the bar in western Michigan. In fertility of resource, in tact and wariness, in keen rate knowledge of the law, in keen and discriminating understanding of the subtle motives which largely control the actions of men, and, above all, in love of justice and loyalty to truth, he is second to no man. He enjoys a large and lucrative practice, and is constantly winning new laurels as a forcible orator. He is an indefatigable worker, and in the preparation of his cases never overlooks any point or fact that may be of the slightest aid to their proper presentation.

Major Morse's splendid record as a soldier will not fail to commend him to those who admire the lofty patriotism which inspired the men who offered their lives that the union might live. He was a brave fighter, as an empty sleeve so eloquently attests. Although a mere youth he won conspicuous honors, and gained the respect and esteem of such commanders as Gens. Sherman and Sheridan.

A more popular candidate for Supreme Judge could not have been nominated. Major Morse will receive the hearty support not only of the two parties which have nominated him, but also of all friends of a patriotic and unbiased judiciary. In full sympathy and earnest accord with the people, he is just the man to be pitted against the republican monopoly candidate. [Lansing Journal.

Letter from Florida.

PORT ORANGE, FLA.,
Feb. 22, 1885.

EDITOR JOURNAL: The JOURNAL of the 12th lies before me. It seems like seeing the face of an old friend. As you published my letter of the 1st, it gives me encouragement to write again, not that I ever expect to become a newspaper correspondent (this is not my forte), but if I am able to interest any of your numerous readers, I shall feel amply repaid for the time and trouble expended.

I my former letter I gave you a detailed sketch of our journey to this place. I shall now endeavor to give you my views in reference to southern Florida, and this county in particular; also the all absorbing topic here: the orange culture.

The first thing for the settler to consider after reaching Florida is the location in a suitable situation for an orange grove. This, whether in the pine woods or in the more fertile hammock, will have to be cleared. If in the former, it will be necessary to cut and burn the pine timber, and also to clear off the scrub palmetto which abounds on these lands. The real tug of war comes in the clearing off of the hammocks, with their tangle of undergrowth and large hardwood trees which are often found as large as six feet in diameter. I noticed one live oak stump on the land owned by John Ackert that is nearly eight feet across the top. The cost of clearing the high pine lands averages from fifteen to twenty-five dollars per acre, while the hammocks cost three to five times as much; but when cleared, of course in its the case of the hammocks, there is the advantage of a naturally richer and more productive soil, requiring no fertilizer whatever, while on the contrary the pine lands have to be constantly fertilized to produce oranges. The usual distance to set orange trees is twenty feet apart each way. This is thought by some to be too near together, while others again set their trees closer than this. At the age of fifteen or eighteen years the limbs of the trees at this distance are in many instances interwoven together, so much so that every alternate tree has to be taken out.

Very many people at the north, who know nothing of the culture of the orange, are under the impression that it takes from eight to ten years after the budded trees are set out to get my returns, however slight, as a reasonable recompense for their labor. While this may be so to some extent with groves planted on the pine lands, it is not so on the hammocks. Trees mature much sooner, and bear more excellent flavored fruit, but whether it will stand the rough usage it gets in being shipped, remains to be seen. A Mr. Johnston, who three years ago set out a grove of one year old bud, picked from that grove five boxes of oranges this winter, and other young groves in this vicinity have done equally well. This was without any fertilizer whatever, and with very little cultivation save cutting the weeds and foul stuff that grew around the trees.

To give your readers an idea of what a man of pluck and energy can do here, I will refer to one man, Marcus Smith, of Daytona, (I give his address and he will bear me witness in what I say), who came to this county eight years ago this winter (then fifty two years of age). With very little capital to commence with, he pulled off his coat and went to work, and as a consequence has one of the finest groves for its age in this county, from which he has picked and shipped five hundred boxes of oranges this winter. He is also extensively engaged in the nursery business, from which he derives quite an income, having sold over three thousand dollars' worth of young orange and lemon trees this winter. I purchased a thousand trees from him, which are mostly set and are looking splendid.

One other grove I will speak of which is said to be the best one in the state, that of Bishop Harris, which lies near Ocala, on Orange lake in Marion county. From this grove there was picked and shipped during the winter of 1882 and 1883, and sent to the New York market, sixty-four thousand dollars worth of oranges. The same grove, it is estimated, will market fifty thousand boxes this winter.

This part of Florida has many attractions for the winter visitor, chief of which is its climate. Of course it is warm at times, but scarcely ever sultry. Sun strokes are almost unknown—the reason is that the heat is tempered by the cool sea breeze. Even in the hottest part of the day step into the shade and you will find it quite cool and refreshing. We have also some disagreeable weather, especially when we get what is termed "a norther." This is when you at Charlevoix get a regular blizzard from the north; when the snow is blowing about your ears. It reaches here in a much milder form, generally with rain. But after two or three days the wind changes, the leaden clouds disappear, the sun shines out bright and clear, the birds singe, the flowers look up and smile sun. Florida is herself again. One of the greatest drawbacks to the orange grower in this part of the state is the lack of facilities for transportation; but this, it is hoped, will be remedied in the course of a few years by the building of a railroad to some point on the Halifax, which can be reached by inland navigation. At present they have to depend on small schooners or coast steamers; and it often occurs that after taking in a cargo of oranges they are not able to get over the bar at the inlet for a week or ten days, on account of the shallow water and unfavorable weather. As a consequence, when the oranges reach their destination, most of them have spoiled by being so long confined in the warm hold of the vessel, and the shippers would not get enough out of the cargo to pay for the freights and for the overhauling of the oranges. Some of the shippers have had to send the money to pay these expenses. So you will readily see that the greatest drawback or hindrance to the development of the business is in the lack of means for placing the oranges in the hands of the consumer.

At present Florida supplies about one third of the total quantity of oranges consumed in the markets to which Florida oranges are sent, the balance coming from the West Indies and Mediterranean ports. The latter we will all admit is very inferior fruit as compared with the Florida orange. So far as the orange business being everlone here, it is capable of indefinite expansion. I am not able to learn at what age the orange tree ceases to be useful in the way of fruit bearing. Certain it is that no trees are to be found in Florida too old for bearing. There is a tree near lake Hanover, about four miles from Bartow, which is one of the largest and finest specimens in Florida. It measures four feet in circumference and fifty-eight feet across the boughs, and bore last year twelve thousand oranges—quite enough to supply the Charlevoix market for some time. Just what age the tree is I am unable to ascertain—it certainly is old enough to vote.

There is in Volusia county a number of old Spanish grants, one of which is in the vicinity of Port Orange, and is called the Dunlawton grant. This land was granted by the Spanish government to one Capt. Dean for meritorious services in the Spanish navy. In the year 1804 he converted this grant, which consisted of one thousand acres, into a sugar plantation, and at one time employed nearly seven hundred negroes. I learn that one year there was shipped from this plantation 16,000 casks of sugar, weighing 450 pounds each. There was a canal cut from the plantation to the Halifax river, over a mile in length, through which was conveyed the sugar by means of flat boats. The first battle of the Seminole war was fought on this plantation, near the old sugar house, which is still standing, though in a very dilapidated condition. It was partly destroyed by the Indians at the time, but was rebuilt after the war with the Seminoles. This building is two hundred and thirty feet in length, and fifty feet wide, and still contains most of the apparatus for the manufacture of sugar, such as the kettles for boiling the cane juice, also most of the engine and one boiler. One end of the building is built of cognesin shell rock, and at the time of the war with the Indians was a kind of fortress, and is pierced with loop holes through which to fire. Capt. Dean was murdered and killed, which so demoralized his followers that they left. Afterwards the grant came into the possession of two men by the name of Dunn & Lawton. This is why the tract is to day known by the name of Dunlawton. The present proprietor, Col. Dougherty, has had the grant out into five and ten acre lots, and has sold a large portion for orange groves. I am under obligations to Col. Dougherty for much valuable information in reference to this country.

I did not intend at the commencement of this to give you such a letter, but the fact is I hardly know where to close, and hope you will bear with me. M. J. S.

Alden Chandlerin appeared in court at Grand Rapids this week to answer the charge of carrying passengers on lake Michigan without license, and was discharged, there being no proof to sustain the complaint. There is evidently a little petty pique out spite at the bottom of this transaction.

Lake Michigan is full of ice as far as the eye can reach. The belt extends out from shore about twenty miles. It is said that the foot of the lake is solidly frozen over. The keeper of South Manitou Island lighthouse, in looking out from high light tower, can discover no trace of water in any direction. Teams cross the ice from Manitou Island to the main land, a distance of twelve miles over the ice, a feat that has not been performed for many years. Ducks and other fowl are found lying on the ice unable to find water and starving. A grebe was caught a few days ago. This is a species of the pelican family, and seldom seen as far south as this. Its home is about Hudson Bay.—[Free Press.

It contains nearly one thousand pages, subdivided into four parts and thirty-six chapters, with over two hundred illustrations and numerous anatomical charts. Mr. Bell is meeting with fair success, and with his plan of delivery will no doubt take a large number of orders. The popular edition is sold at $1,50,—within the reach of nearly every family.

Historical Society.

Society met on Tuesday evening February 24th, at the parlors of Mrs. L. D. Bartholomew, there being a large number present and all enjoyed a very pleasant time. The program as arranged was an opening piano solo by Blanch Bartholomew. Paper prepared and read by Mrs. Flora Nelson was well worked and instructively delivered, subject "Tennison." Miss Orser's vocal solo was well rendered as was also the reading of Miss E. Severance. Miss Winnie Bartholomew closed the evening entertainment with a piano solo. After dispensing with the regular order of business, the Society adjourned for one week, to meet with Mr. and Mrs. E. M. Clark, on Tuesday evening, March 3d.

On Thursday evening last, March 2d, at Mr. and Mrs. E. M. Clark's, The Society met and were called to order by the President, at 7:30 p. m., a large number were present, and a very interesting program arranged. Opening exercises was a trio, Messrs. Washburn, Crane and Brown. The paper of which Mrs. H. S. Harsha was the author, was fine, her subject being "Chaucer." Mrs. Harsha showed Chaucer to be a favorite poet and did herself proud indeed, in the manner in which her paper was delivered, much to the interest of all present. After a short intermission the Society were again entertained with a trio by Messrs. Washburn, Crane and Brown. Miss A. Cochrane's recitation were well delivered and well received. Music, trio. Select reading by Mrs. C. J. Grier, and attentively listened to. The Society then resumed the regular order of business, and after finishing the same, were by motion adjourned for one week, to meet again with Mr. and Mrs. E. H. Green, on Tuesday evening next, March 10th, and a large attendance is looked for. A very interesting program will be prepared.

WOMAN GOSSIP.

A New Maid of Athens.

Maid of Athens, we must part,
I hear your father—I must start;
He's broking of his nightly rest;
Discussion on my part is best.
I'd better off.

Maid of Athens, I must go,
Kiss me once, for luck you know;
Your father's best is on the stair—
Note but the brave deserve the fair—
The one who's lift.

Maid of Athens, just once more—
Little chipie must hug the shore;
Hark! the dog has broken his chain.
Zounds! I am in hard luck again—
Great Scot! I'm lift.

Digestible Biscuits.

Mr. Minks—"Ah, my dear fellow, allow me to congratulate you! Been married almost a month, haven't you?" Mr. Pink—"Over a month." "Has your love stood the test of matrimony?" "Perfectly." "Sure of it, eh?" "Could not be more so. We had biscuits for dinner yesterday." "Did wifey make them?" "Yes." "And you ate them?" "Yes." "Without a murmur?" "Without a murmur." "Happy man!"—Auburn News.

Woman as an Artist.

Is there any reason for supposing that among the sex who has made the best word pictures of the age or of any age preceding there should not be found those who can put their ideas into pictures, and thus prove their superiority? I say no.

I say, moreover, that neither Raphael nor Rembrandt nor Meissonier ever had it in them to translate through brush and pencil our lovely little men and women of the nursery to our deep and thorough and loving comprehension so well as the lady artists of today are beginning to do, and all because they do not know them so well nor appreciate them so truly.

I do not know that women will ever make historical pictures. Their living genius reaches forth toward subjects warm with life. And it is just such subjects that will touch all human hearts, and found a new school of painting that will eclipse all the other schools of painting that have ever been.—Helen Wilmans, in Chicago Express.

Why a Husband Drew Forth His Wallet.

"I haven't seen your pet dog for several days," said a Somerville husband to his wife.

"No," she replied; "the fact is I have given him away."

"Why, you needn't have done that. I had no particular objection to him."

"Oh, I know that, but I thought it was not right for me to have a pet dog about the house when I have such a good, kind husband to lavish my affections upon."

The husband sank into a chair, with a deep sigh.

"How much do you want, Mary?" he asked, as he drew his wallet from his pocket; "I can't be a scaldskin sacque, for the winter is nearly over."

"No," she said, "it is not a scaldskin sacque; but I would really like a new silk for the spring, and you know it's got to be bought and made, and all that."

"Now," he said, as he handed her the money, "what proof of your affection will you give me when you want another dress, since you have given away your dog?"

"Oh," she sweetly replied, "I've given the dog to my sister, and I can get him back again."—Somerville Journal.

Mussulman Marriages.

The law of marriage among the Mohammedans is very curious and interesting. The prohibited degrees are not very unlike those of Christian countries, except that they comprise foster relationship. But women, not men, are tattooed or prohibited by various peculiar rules as to equality in family, religion, freedom, character, fortune and calling. A husband of a free woman must not condemn her to inferior companionship by marrying afterward a slave. The first Mussulman of his family must not aspire to wed a woman whose father and grandfather are Mussulmans. So, too, there is an inequality enough to justify a divorce where the husband is proved to be a drunkard or a profligate. Barbers and savageses should not look for brides to the families of merchants and perfumers. A marriage may be dissolved by the Cadi for inequality where the bridegroom is without means for supporting the wife for a year, or at least a month. Some of these prohibitions are clearly obsolete. Their general purpose may well have been the laudable one of defending the weaker party in a contract of marriage from disargrement. The same appears to be the object of the very minute provisions laid down for showing consent by the woman. A father, though he may give his unmarried daughter in marriage, cannot decide peremptorily on an adult daughter's marriage. There must be consent, though when a father, brother, or uncle is making the contract, a maiden's silence may be construed to signify it. When the contract is the act of a stranger or a distant relative, positive words of consent are required. The most stringent prohibitions relate, however, to religion. Marriage is illegal between Mussulmans and disbelievers in a revelation. A Mussulman may marry a Jew or Christian who believes in the Old Testament, and even a Sabean, or worshiper of the stars, if she believes in the Jewish Scriptures also, but marriage between a Mohammedan and a Parsee, for example, would apparently be unlawful. Idolaters may marry between themselves if they are born unbelievers. An apostate, it is held, can not contract marriage even with an infidel. The same solicitude which guards women against unions which may prejudice them in body, estate, or soul, watches anxiously over their right to dower. The law descends into very minute details on the nature of the things of which the dower may consist. Pork, which is discourteously stigmatized as carrion, and wine, as sought in pre-mused, cannot constitute dower for a believer, though either might, if stipulated for, make dower for an unbeliever. By no antecedent act of her own can a woman divest herself of her right to dower in the event of her marriage. The practical advantage of the principle is certainly questioned by the fact that after marriage she may remit the whole. On this other hand, her power even to do herself an injury is evidence that women are not the mere chattels they are often supposed to be by strangers to Mussulman laws and customs.

Women in Washington.

I have thought sometimes that I would write you one letter dwelling on the "sunny side" of society life as a correspondent at Washington's seat of sway is writer in the Boston Transcript. Yet it seems ungracious to do so, where the pleasant side predominates so largely. I have no ambition, for the sake of being a disciple, to be categorized by those who can not "strike back."

Well, for the sunny side of long seats. Would leave a sine within a broke's heart. Still more, a sister woman's heart, whose secret point would be wounded were it known to the world that she lacked savoir faire in matters so trivial as those that pertain to success in society.

Many things do come under a correspondent's notice, however, that appeal irresistibly to the comic vein, and this arises largely from the transient nature of those who figure here, the endeavors of the relays of social forces that are all the while coming to us fresh from the people. As illustrating this, I call to mind the letter of a far Western Senator's wife whose term expired some time ago. She had been ill, or otherwise prevented from figuring in what she regarded as "society," during the most of her husband's term, and the last winter of their stay she evidently resolved to cut a figure or perish in the attempt. She was brought by a friend of mine to see me early on one of my reception days, just after she had come on from New York in December, with a stunning wardrobe, which she kindly described to me at some length. The elegant velvet apartgarness she wore she rose and particularly called my attention to, in the details of its trimming and other salient points. Finally she told me that if I would take care of her interests in my column during the winter I should be well paid for it. By this time I had discovered that the lady did not know any better, and I said that if she took a part in society I would be happy to mention her name in turn with the rest; but that I never made a specialty of one over another, and my pecuniary contract was with the editor-in-chief, and at all with those of whom I wrote. She expressed much surprise, and said she had always supposed that Society ladies paid for such things, and she log-rolled that I would not feel that she had taken any liberty with me." The entrances of other rallers enabled me to lose her out quietly without expressing all I felt; but it is needless to say that I never returned her call. The morning after the following New Year's (1883) I received a letter from her, written in pencil on a sheet of paper with the August heading, "United States Senate, Washington, D. C., 18—." Shamed in line is as upper right-hand corner; and, more incongruous yet, the Senator (her husband) himself brought it, and told me he would pay for its insertion, as he was very anxious to gratify his wife.

The lady had the bad taste to sign herself as a full participator in her husband's office and honors. If the wife of Chief Justice Waite has occasion to write to a press correspondent a note regarding any of her sunny charities, she sighs herself modestly "Amelia C. Waite;" likewise the wife of Gen. Sherman signs herself "Ellen Ewing Sherman," while the wife of his Senior brother, with the same unassuming dignity, subscribes herself "Celia Stewart Sherman." I have many autograph letters of that character which I prize for their sweet individuality, as well as for being records of benevolent acts, in which it has been my privilege to be interested together with those and their kin, rather known at a distance by their place in the government pageant of official life than by the humanities of their daily living.

It is only your shallow, flaunting women who thrust her husband's public station, or even his given name, into the "Mrs." prefixed, grandiloquently and inappropriately, as I have in my collection one nearly as florid as the above, signed "Mrs. Judge — — and not so much asking as commanding me to report the sale of a shawl at the British Legation, and to mention that she was "unlucky in having brocaded satin ornaments diamonds."

A REVEREND gentleman, addressing a Sunday-school concert, was trying to impress upon the minds of the little ones were sinful and needed repentance. Taking his watch and holding it up he said: "Now, my boys, I do not suppose it does not keep good time; now goes too fast, now too slow; what shall I do with it?" "Sell it!" shouted a youngster.

SPEAKING of a commercial traveler who was arrested for embezzlement, an exchange says: "He confessed his guilt." A drummer may own up to guilt, but to brass—never.

THE OLD ROMAN'S TALK.

Interview with Senator Thurman—Extravagance in Office as Compared with the Good Old Days—Reminiscences.

A New York World correspondent recently interviewed ex-Senator Allen G. Thurman, at his modest home in Columbus, Ohio:

"In a quiet, unpretentious-looking two-story red brick house on High street, a few blocks away from the State capitol building, lives ex-Senator Thurman. He built the house when he moved from Chillicothe, Ohio, to Columbus in 1852, and it has been his home ever since. This is a small yard in front and the door is reached by a single stone step. I was let in by a little homesemaid who looks as clean as a pin and smooth as if she had just come from hearing one of Cotton Mather's sermons. I waited 1 step into the library. Mr. Thurman would be down in a moment. I went back through the broad, high hallway that reminded me of a Virginia house of the olden time, and found the library to be a large, square room with many easy chairs, a table with a lamp, shelves of books reaching to the ceiling on two sides, and a big, roaring fire. And in a moment in came the great ex-Senator. I knew him before I went there he was seventy-one years old, and I expected to see a man somewhat bent with age, and very white-headed. But he was not bent, nor was he very white-headed. What he had set down in my big note-book, which he comfortably filled, he looked very hale and comfortable. He was stronger, far rather and younger looking than two-thirds of the members of the United States Supreme Court, and he looked very well compared with Mr. Tilden when he was mustaded for President out in Ohio.

"The correspondent asked Mr. Thurman if he would talk for publication about the topic of the day, Cleveland's Cabinet, at the same time stating that he, Mr. Thurman, had been mentioned for a place. The grandeur and sweet manner as follows:

"I do not think it would become me. Any expression of opinion from me now would be ill-timed and out of place. As to my going into the Cabinet, I will say only this: I have received a hundred letters, I suppose, from kind friends all over the United States, expressing the hope that I would be selected as one of Mr. Cleveland's advisers. I have not even answered one of those letters. Some of them are from gentlemen I esteem very highly, and I fear they think strange of my silence in not answering them, for they have taken extended use, but I have felt, and still feel, that not one word on the subject shall fall from my lips. I have not authorized a living soul to speak to Mr. Cleveland in my behalf. I have not seen him myself, and I have never said to anyone that I would offer accept or decline a place in his Cabinet. Mr. Cleveland ought to be left to make up his counsel without any pressure. Positions in the Cabinet are not plums. Positions in the Cabinet are not plums. Positions in the Cabinet are not plums

There is a temperance lesson in the fact that three empty quart bottles that had contained whisky were found by the side of five Indians who froze to death in Indian Territory the other day.

Captain Williams, the famous police officer of New York, is a strong temperance man and urges the practice of temperance upon the men in command. He congratulates himself that four of his sergeants, four roundsmen, and two detectives are good, solid temperance men.

Alabama and Missouri have passed bills similar to the Michigan law, providing for the study in the schools of hygiene and physiology with special reference to the effect of alcoholic drinks, stimulants, and narcotics upon the human system. New Jersey and Pennsylvania are discussing the question, and Georgia and Florida are expected to follow in the work very soon. All this is a direct result of the work of the W. C. T. U.

That was a thrilling episode in the Murphy temperance revival at Pittsburgh when, after a substantial had signed the pledge, the crowd adjourned en masse to his place of business, and there, mounted on the abominable bar, young Edward Murphy, in an eloquent dedication, gave the place over hereafter to the Lord's work. The empty bottles have been decorated with the "badge of blue," and the place will be kept from this time as a temperance coffee house.

Fire Wards.

For the purpose of indicating as near as possible by the ringing of the bell the location of a fire, the village has been divided into wards and numbered. In ringing an alarm of fire, after the general alarm is given, the number of slower strokes of the bell will indicate the number of the ward.

First Ward—all on north side of the river.

Second Ward—both sides of Bridge street between the river and Antrim street, and west to State street.

Third Ward—all west of State and north of Antrim streets.

Fourth Ward—Upnigih & Hurlburt addition.

Fifth Ward—all south of Antrim street and east of State street to Charlevoix Resort.

Sixth Ward—Charlevoix Resort.

Alarms may be given through any telephone in town, night or day.

March has come, bringing sunshine and warmth. Town meeting draweth nigh and the office seeker has assumed himself in an anxious attitude, waiting for the fruits.

Mrs. Sigle Hawks and family are spending a few days with friends and relatives in this vicinity.

Mrs. Adam Barkley and daughter Emma, who have been for the past two years visiting friends in St. Lawrence, N. Y., recently returned home.

We always deem it a pleasure to make mention of the schools as they progress—therefore it is with pride we speak of the efficient manner in which our village school has been conducted by Miss Nettie M. Hawkes. During the day she has made many new friends among the patrons and pupils of the school, and strenuous efforts were made to induce her to remain as preceptress during next term of school. We are gratified to learn that she has partially promised to do so.

An observing philosopher contradicts the prevailing theory that mental activity interferes with physical beauty. He says "A handsome man or woman either who does nothing but live well or self-indulgently grows flabby, and at the fine lines of the features are lost; but the hard thinker has an admirable sculptor always at work, keeping his fine lines in repair, and constantly going over his face to improve the original design."

The Chicago

Weekly News

AND THE

Charlevoix Journal

ONE YEAR

For $2.00

THE CHICAGO WEEKLY NEWS is now an eight page, sixty-four column paper. It is the largest "dollar weekly" in America. Its eight broad long pages present each week a mass of closely selected matter, containing much in suitable of the varying tastes of the family circle. First and foremost it gives ALL THE NEWS, complete as to details, yet concise in form. Its columns (for which the CHICAGO DAILY NEWS (member of the Associated Press) gives it facilities for news gathering unsurpassed by any journal in the country. Its MARKET REPORTS are specially complete and thoroughly reliable. Particular attention is given to agricultural and home matters. Every issue contains SIX COMPLETED STORIES, and a regular installment of an original story by some well-known English or American author, exclusively secured for the CHICAGO DAILY NEWS. Its condensed miscellaneous matter, art, literature, science, etc., etc., appear regularly.

Few papers in the country are so extensively quoted by the press in general for its bright and humorous paragraphs as the Chicago Daily News. These are all reproduced in the WEEKLY NEWS. In its editorial expression the paper speaks from the standpoint of the INDEPENDENT journal, thereby escaping the temptation to support or condemn the open bundle under the pressure of party allegiance. More partisan extremes will not like it; the fair minded and thoughtful of all parties will appreciate and value its candid statements of facts and conclusions, all carefully to qualify the reader for the formation of his own intelligent opinion. The political events of the year to come promise to assume such a character that a thoroughly truthful and impartial record becomes all important rather than a partisan one, colored and perverted to individual liking.

In all its departments the CHICAGO WEEKLY NEWS aims to present an entertaining, impartial and entertaining family newspaper of the very highest grade.

DAVE BRADBEER,
Charlevoix, Mich.

WHEREAS, default has been made in the payment of the money secured by a mortgage dated the 1st day of August, A. D. 1882, executed by Michael Donovan and Ann Donovan, of Charlevoix, Michigan, to Sidney I. A. Gilbert, of Kalamazoo, Michigan, which said mortgage was recorded in the office of the register of deeds of the County of Charlevoix, in liber 1 of mortgages, on page 234, on the 26th day of October, A. D. 1882, which said mortgage was given to secure the payment of a promissory note of even date with said mortgage, payable at the date of this notice to the sum of fifty-one dollars and sixty cents ($51.60) principal and interest, and which is the whole amount unpaid upon said note and mortgage at the date hereof, and no proceeding at law has been instituted to recover said debt, or any part thereof, whereby the power of sale contained in said mortgage has become operative. Now, therefore, by virtue of the power of sale contained in said mortgage and the statute in such case made and provided, I shall foreclose said mortgage by sale of the mortgaged premises, or sufficient thereof to satisfy said debt and all legal costs and expenses, which sale will be made at the house of C. Lewis Hall, in Charlevoix, Charlevoix County, Michigan, the place where the Circuit Court for the county of Charlevoix is held, on the 12th day of April, A. D. 1883, which said premises are described in said mortgage as follows, to wit: The south half of the southeast quarter of section twenty-three (23), township thirty-three (33), and Thirteen (13), of Michigan and Indiana meridian, containing one hundred and twenty acres, according to the present public survey of said lands.

Dated Charlevoix, Mich., February 27, A. D. 1883.

Letter from Florida.

PORT ORANGE, FLA., March 2, 1883.

EDITOR JOURNAL:—Your readers will probably think that I wish to gain notoriety as a correspondent to a public journal, as I write again so soon after my last letter; but this is the last time I shall have an opportunity to write you from this place this winter. I leave for home the latter part of the week; my work here has been accomplished much sooner than I expected; in fact the work on all the groves represented by people from Charlevoix is complete, and altogether we have a grove of nearly two thousand trees, all looking finely and in a few years we at least expect some returns for the time and money expended. We expect to be able at least to supply the Charlevoix market. Our groves consist mostly of orange trees, although we have several hundred lemons. As to the varieties raised in the state they are very many, and from what we have been able to learn we have as choice varieties as can be found. And it is well for the person who contemplates setting out a grove, to know what varieties he sets. Until the past few years, orange trees were very scarce, and one was glad to get anything that resembled an orange tree, pay the price and ask no questions. Planting a grove is not planting a field of wheat or potatoes. If the wheat or potatoes are of a poor variety, your loss is only one season, and you can by experience decide what crops to try the next; but with trees it is different. It takes years to decide whether the varieties are what are desired, consequently he must buy of some responsible nursery man to be sure he gets his trees true to name, although he may have to pay a little more for them. One of the greatest pests the orange grower has to contend with is the deer, which browse off the young sprouts from the trees. Especially is this so in the young groves. Mr. Carpenter did not site gether escape them, although he had a good barbed wire fence around the grove he set last winter. I have often heard it said that necessity was the mother of invention. This I illustrated one day last week while at the hammock (two miles from home). It commenced to rain very hard, and I looked as though I should get a good drenching (it rains when it rains here) before I got home; but I improvised an umbrella from three leaves of the palmetto, by tieing the butts of the leaves together, placed it on my head and walked home as dry as a chip. I expected to astonish the natives when I reached town, but I learned they had often done the same thing themselves.

Speaking of the natives, calls to mind that those who live along the coast wish to tell you anything that transpired, say "it was so many years before or after the wreck of the steamer Vera Cruz." They reaped a big harvest at that time, consequently remember the circumstance. The inhabitants of Tennessee or Georgia date their events from the time of the surrender.

Of the timber in Florida the varieties are many; they consist mostly of pitch pine, live oak, water oak, sweet gum, magnolia, hickory and cypress. Some of these trees attain to very large size, especially the live oak which frequently grows to eight feet in diameter and whose branches extend to a distance of eighty feet. Very much of this timber has been cut and shipped in years past to foreign countries for ship building.

So far as the general health is concerned I am not able to give you very much information; on this my experience and observation has been very limited. There are localities where it cannot help but be malarious—especially is this so among the hammocks, and where stagnant water is found; but along the coast we have an abundance of pure fresh air, with a plentiful supply of good water, which is obtained from artesian wells. This is obtained by driving a pipe with point attached a distance of ninety to ninety-five feet, when the vein is struck and the waters flows in one continuous stream from the top of the pipe. Those unaccustomed to the use of this water would not like it at first, as it is very strongly impregnated with sulphur, and tastes something like warm rain water with a plentiful supply of rotten eggs well stirred in; but in a few hours it loses this taste and is good and pure.

The time was when a man dare not express his views here, but citizens here as elsewhere in the south, are becoming more liberal in their views and courtesies. Emigrants need not fear the cold shoulder, much less aggressions upon their rights, but may expect the kindness and welcome that every where to well behaved strangers.

If I find anything of interest I may write you from New Orleans, as it is my intention to visit there before my return. I will probably reach home about the 20th. M. J. S.

Pretty "Bulwarks" These.

Partisanship leads a great many people to make themselves very ridiculous. For instance, no remark is more frequent in Republican prints just now than this one: "The Republican majority in the United States Senate is the only bulwark of defense against a raid on the Treasury and the offices by hungry and thirsty Democrats."

This particular sentence is taken from the New York Tribune, a newspaper supposedly published for the information and entertainment of rational human beings. In the light of the recent vote by the United States Senate on the Pacific Mail subsidy steal, how ridiculous such partisan fooling appears! Of the thirty votes in favor of that infamous job twenty-six were cast by Republicans whom we are told are to be a bulwark of the Treasury, and of the eighteen votes cast against the measure only one was that of a Republican. If the aims and tendencies of the two parties may be judged by this performance the United States Senate cannot be put into other hands any too soon for the good of the country.—[Chicago Herald.

On Wednesday the President sent in the following nominations to the Senate:

Secretary of State—Thos. F. Bayard, of Delaware.

Secretary of the Interior—L. Q. C. Lamar, of Mississippi.

Secretary of the Navy—Wm. C. Whitney, of New York.

EASTERN.

It is said that agents of American and foreign dynamite societies have been experimenting in a secluded valley near Huntingdon, Pa., the results of their investigations being the perfecting of a destructive machine of great power which can be timed with the utmost nicety.

A special dispatch from New York, intoned on what is claimed to be reliable mental authority, says:

Notwithstanding the rose-colored report of Gen. Grant's health recently given in a medical journal, the truth is too Grant is a very sick man, and his death is apparently not far distant. The public have no conception of the shattered condition of his physical system. It is hoped the affection of the tongue may not prove fatal, but there is, as yet, no appearance of its not developing a malignant and fatal disease. Although somewhat better now than some weeks ago, the enlarged and inflamed tongue continues, making it painful to speak or swallow fluids, the only nourishment he can take. In addition to this malady Gen. Grant is a terrible sufferer from neuralgia, and it seems to have taken possession of his whole system. He has had most of his teeth drawn to lessen the neuralgic torture, and his injury in the hip, caused by his fall a year ago, is still a source of very great suffering and terrible physical exertion. It is a fact that should no longer be concealed from the country that Gen. Grant is rapidly breaking down and apparently without hope of reaction, and unless there should be some unexpected relief, he will not be long among the living.

At the Court of General Sessions in New York City, Richard Shaw, who robbed Capt. Dahlen in Delmonico Rosso's office, pleaded not guilty. His bail was increased from $5,000 to $8,000. Mrs. Dudley, the woman who shot Rosso, was held in $500 bail. A plea of not guilty was also entered in her behalf.

William H. Vanderbilt recently paid a New York banking firm $8,000,000 for sufficient West Shore bonds to control the road.

So deep has been the frost on the island of Nantucket that two houses were filled with corpses that could not be buried.

As the result of a domestic misunderstanding, Dr. Moritz Richter shot and killed Prof. S. Clark Smith, a public school principal, at Middletown, N. Y. The murderer is imprisoned at Herkimer.

WESTERN.

In Madison County, Illinois, winter wheat has suffered seriously from the intense cold; the farmer reports that 20 acres of his crop has been killed.

Forty thousand brook trout, destined for streams in Grant County, Wisconsin, were frozen to death while in transit from the State hatchery.

A financial cyclone struck St. Louis last week, resulting in two heavy suspensions on the Merchants' Exchange. B. W. Lewis and E. M. Samuel & Sons were crowded to the wall by a break in May wheat.

A plot to rob the State Treasury of Nebraska became known at Lincoln early in February, the day the last week three men stepped to the cashier's window in the State House, presented pistols at the head of Deputy Barnard, and took $400 in coin. As they walked away, a detective fired at them, and killed one named James Griffin, Alva McGuire was captured, and the third party escaped. The robbers named had each previously killed his man, but escaped conviction on the plea of self-defense. There are suspicions that the affair was a clever job engineered by local detectives solely to secure reputation. The revolver of one of the alleged heroines was found to be loaded with blank cartridges only, and there are other suspicious circumstances in connection with the affair.

During the season ended March 1, 3,245,425 hogs were packed at Cincinnati, against 2,945,475 the preceding season.

W. H. Lemon, a student in a medical college at St. Louis, killed himself because he failed to pass the final examination.

Gen. Francis Darr and other Californians have tendered Gen. Grant and his family, as a gift, a large fruit farm near Fresno in the State, which would be conducted by a skilled viticulturist, with a residence and necessary outbuildings. All the expenses of the General and his party to the Mecca coast would be paid, the Central Pacific Road generously offering to send special cars to New York for their conveyance Westward.

The California Supreme Court has decided that Chinese children must be admitted to the public schools.

Six convicts escaped from the Michigan Penitentiary through a tunnel forty feet in length, on which they had probably worked a year. They cut through twelve feet of solid masonry, forming the basis of the prison wall.

Since Feb. 1 five manufacturing establishments at Detroit have put 2,300 men to work.

Near Sault Ste. Marie, Mich., Timothy Coughlin killed two Indians who threatened him because he would not pay borrowed money. He dried but one shot, the bullet killing the first instantly, and wounding the other so that he died next day.

The damage to winter wheat in Ohio by severe weather is reported at 25 per cent. From reports received by Mr. S. W. Talmadge, of Milwaukee, he estimates that the yield of 1885 throughout the country will fall largely below that of last year.

SOUTHERN.

Near Smith's Mills, Union County, Ky., Moses Caton, aided by his sons, took out his wife and hanged her. A posse came to arrest the Catons, but they resisted, when four of them were shot, two and daughter probably mortally. An attempt was made to take the five prisoners from the jail, but it failed.

In the case of the State against the murderers of A. H. Murphy, at New Orleans, the jury returned a verdict of guilty against Pat Ford and Tolmanny John Murphy, and manslaughter against Judge Thomas J. Ford, W. H. Caulfield, and Thomas Buckley.

Thos. J. Nevin, ex-Mayor of Adrian, Mich., who absconded in 1882, was arrested at New Orleans last week. He did not attempt to conceal his identity, and consented to return to Michigan without a requisition.

One hundred thousand cattle are ready to take the trail north from Southwest Texas if the quarantine laws of other States will permit their passage.

While celebrating the inauguration of Cleveland, the people of Hopkinsville, Ky., thought they saw a meteor that looked like a burning cabin, which exploded with the noise of a dozen cannon.

The safe in the postoffice at Ozark, Ark., was blown open and robbed of $800.

WASHINGTON.

William Gresham, who confabled Albert Gilton on the streets in Washington, was arraigned in a police court in that city, together with Smith and Ruff, two other young society men, who were present as witnesses of the affray. Gilton charged Smith and Ruff with participating in the assault. This was denied on the part of the defense, Gresham said that an insult offered by Gilton to a lady whom escort Gresham was accompanied the trouble, the last challenged Gilton to a fist fight, which the latter declined, and he had according been compelled to seek satisfaction publicly. In disposing of the case Judge Snell referred to the participants as fastidious dudes and sentenced Gresham to two months in jail Smith and Ruff were fined $100 each.

The decrease in the public debt during February was $3,981,975. The following is the principle of the debt is now $1,194,190,950. Deducting the cash in the Treasury, The United States owes $7,465,952,950. Following is the official statement issued from the Treasury:

POLITICAL.

Following is the reply addressed by Mr. Cleveland to the silver-seekers at counsel in Congress:

To Hon. J. A. Warner and others, members of the Forty-eighth Congress:

Gentlemen, the letter which I have had the honor to receive from you under date, indeed, obliges me to give expression to some of my public impressions, although in advance of the moment when they would become subject to my official care and partial responsibility. Your solicitude that my utterances shall have been carefully and sufficiently formed is entirely just, and I accept the suggestion in the same friendly spirit in which it has been made. It is also fully justified by the nature of the financial crisis which, under the operation of the act of Congress of February 28, 1878, is now close at hand. By compliance with the requirements of that law all values in the Federal Treasury have been until very lately filled with silver coins which are now worth less than 85 per cent. of the gold dollar prescribed as "the unit of value" in section 14 of the act of Feb. 12, 1873, and which, with silver certificates representing such coin, are receivable for all public dues, being thus receivable, while also constantly increasing in quantity at the rate of a expensive per year, it has followed of necessity that the flow of gold into the Treasury has been steadily diminishing. Silver and silver certificates have displaced it to the non-depositing gold, and the sum of gold in the Federal Treasury now available for the payment of the gold obligations of the United States and for the redemption of United States notes stand on "greenback," if not already encroached upon, is perhaps only some such circumstances. These are facts which, as they do not admit of difference of opinion, call for no argument. They have been foreseen and forecast to us in the official reports of every Secretary of the Treasury from 1878 till now. They are plainly affirmed in the last December report of the present Secretary of the Treasury to the Speaker of the present House of Representatives. They appear in the official documents of this Congress, and in the records of the New York Clearing House, of which the Treasury is a member, and through which the bulk of receipts and payments of the Federal Government and the country pass. These being the facts, our present condition, our danger, and our duty to avert that danger, would seem to be plain. I hope you concur with me and with a great majority of our fellow-citizens, in deeming it most desirable at the present juncture to maintain and continue in use the issues of our gold coin as well as the issues of silver already coined. This is possible by the present suspension of the purchase and coinage of silver. I am not aware that by any other method it is possible. It is of momentous importance to prevent the two metals parting company, to prevent increasing displacement of gold by increasing the coinage of silver, to prevent the drawing of gold in the custom-houses of the United States in the daily business of the people, to prevent the ultimate expulsion of gold by silver. Such a financial crisis as these events would certainly precipitate, were it now to follow upon so long a period of commercial disorder, would insure the passing of the silver and every State in the Union in prolonged and disastrous trouble. The overall success attendant and apparent to our world be hopelessly postponed. Gold would be withdrawn to Industrial pieces, and be unprecedented contraction in the actual volume of our currency would speedily take place. The sudden of all, in every workshop, mill, factory, mine, and on every cultivated and farm, the wages of labor, already distressed, would suffer still further pressing by the shrinking down of the purchasing power of every specie dollar and the loss of the issue of toil.

From these impending calamities it is surely the most patriotic and grateful duty of the representatives of the people to deliver us. Yours, gentlemen, with sincere respect, your fellow citizen, GROVER CLEVELAND.

Albany, Feb. 24.

The conference committees of the Minnesota Legislature agreed to the clause in the railway bill that a party adopting one one of grain shall be free from the same tariff rates as the man who ships 100 or more cars.

The Senate of Arkansas passed a bill to change to Cleveland the name of a county originally named for Stephen W. Dorsey.

MISCELLANEOUS.

The Mexican centuos reports for January show an increase of $230,000 over the preceding month. The Central railway is carrying large amounts of American corn to the capital.

The Legislature of British Columbia has passed a bill, to take effect two weeks, imposing upon Chinamen an annual tax of $50 in lieu of the present $10 and $50 in imprisonment for six months.

The failures reported for the past week in the United States were 226, of which 85 per cent. were in petty traders.

Stephen Clarke, afflicted with hydrophobia, was hanged at Bellefonte, Pa., last week, he had asked for the rope, that he might be hanged, that he might be hanged, that he might be hanged

Democratic Nominations.

For Justice of the Supreme Court,
ALLEN B. MORSE.

For Regents of the University,
CHARLES R. WHEELMAN.
MOSES W. FIELD.

Hon. Allen B. Morse.

Hon. Allen B. Morse, the fusion nominee for judge of the supreme court, was born in Ottawa, Iowa county, this state, Jan. 7, '39. His father, Hon. John L. Morse, was for 12 years probate judge, and also a member of the state legislature, and has also held high judicial and legislative offices since his removal to Wight county, Ia.

Allen B. was educated at the agricultural college, and commenced to study law in 1860. He was one of the first to enlist when the war broke out, joining the Sixteenth Michigan as private.

In 1863 he was transferred to the Twenty-first Michigan, and by gallantry at Chickamauga won a position on the staff of Col. F. T. Sherman, who commanded the first brigade of Sherman's division. He led the storming party at the attack on Mission Ridge and there lost an arm. On being invalided out he received most flattering testimonials from both Sherman and Sheridan, his record including conspicuous bravery at Hanover court house, Gaines' Mill, Manassas, Antietam and Chickamauga. Returning home he resumed his law studies, and in 1866 was elected prosecuting attorney of Ionia county. In 1874, as democratic candidate for senator, he carried his district, one of the most republican in the state, by a majority of 2,211. In the same year he married the daughter of George W. Van Allen, by whom he has one son and several children. As a lawyer Mr. Morse has long been famous for purity, if ever, making a mistake. He has a masterly faculty for grouping the material points in the case at issue and declaring them from an unerring conclusion. His delivery is clear, finest and forcible, and his opinions, once formed, are tenaciously held.

He makes sure he is right and then goes ahead. In private life he is immensely popular among a large circle of friends, being just enough "one of the boys" to be liked by everybody.

He is a great sportsman and fisherman, a good story-teller, and a good fellow all around. The best proof of his popularity and ability is that he can sweep his native county for any office in the gift of those who know him best.—[Detroit Evening News.

Notes and News.

The pharmacy bill has passed the senate.

The Evening News of last Saturday contains some very valuable advice to office hunters.

The Detroit Evening Journal now takes the associated press report, adding very much to the value as a newspaper.

"My dear sir, do you notice how much sweeter the air is this morning?" remarked H. H. Vanmorum on the morning after the inauguration.

The steamer suspended in front of the JOURNAL office last fall, caused some comment from the manner in which it was put up, but it outlived those put up in a more "scientific" manner, and still floats upon the breeze.

Laws should be rigidly enforced which prohibit the immigration of servile classes to compete with American labor with no intention of acquiring citizenship and bringing with them and retaining habits and customs repugnant to our civilization.—[Grover Cleveland.

The Allegan Democrat pays the following just compliment to the Fusion candidate for Supreme Judge: "In his own county he has won a name for integrity, business capacity and legal acumen, combined with a tender love of its fellow men unequaled by any other man in the state, and is ever expressed by their almost unanimous support of him for any office which he will accept. We predict for him 5,000 majority in the fifth district, and a triumphant election in April. He will be no tool of the corporations while expounding the law in the court of last resort, in this commonwealth. The prayer of the poor suppliant for justice will be listened to as carefully and responded to as quickly as that of the millionaire."

Newspaper publishers should be on their guard against the publishers of Rutledge's Monthly, Eastown, Pa. The concern now owe the Herald two bills, and four letters and postal cards have failed to elicit a response from them. A third proposition is now being made country publishers. Pass them around for the good of the craft.—[Big Rapids Herald.

The Public Herald, L. Lum Smith, editor, 706 Chestnut street, Philadelphia, devotes a large space every month to the exposure of swindling concerns, such as "Prof. W. H. Armstrong," and the "Call Publishing Co." recently mentioned in our columns, and we are of the opinion that an occasional reference to the Herald will be of positive benefit in avoiding similar experiences in the future.

The United States Democrat, successor to the LaCrosse Democrat, will after March 7, be issued from Washington, D. C., instead of New York. M. M. "Brick" Pomeroy, the editor, giving as his reason for the change, "the better to make things warm for the boys." It is a weekly, eight-page paper, $2 per year, and "Brick" Pomeroy is so well known to the people, it is not necessary for us to say anything about the quality of it.

Congressman Cutcheon's illness has kept him to his bed in Washington for two or three weeks, and although some better it was doubtful last Monday whether he would be able to attend the closing session of Congress. Cutcheon has not cut a swath quite as broad as some other men, but although not so well known to the people, he has ever been a faithful and industrious servant of the people, and we hope he may yet live many years to enjoy the fruits of his labors.

The Detroit Post has stated that he had a paralytic stroke, and when an important measure was to be acted upon.—[Big Rapids Herald.

We should never be ashamed of simplicity and prudential economies, which are best suited to the operation of a Republican form of government, and most compatible with the mission of the American people. Those who are selected for a limited time to manage the public affairs are still of the people, and may do much by their example to encourage consistently with the dignity of the official functions that plain way of life, which among their fellow citizens adds to integrity and promotes thrift and prosperity.—[Grover Cleveland.

Due regard for the interests and prosperity of all the people demand that our finances shall be established upon such a sound and sensible basis as shall secure the safety and confidence of our business interests, and make the wages of labor sure and steady, and that our system of revenue shall be so adjusted as to relieve the people from unnecessary taxation, having due regard for the interest of capital invested and working men employed in American industries, and prevent the accumulation of surplus in the treasury, to tempt to extravagance and waste.—[Grover Cleveland.

The following paragraph from President Cleveland's inaugural message, can be construed to mean that little attention will be given to the universal demand for a change of the Federal offices as a reward for party services. The old doctrine of "to the victors belong the spoils" will not be recognized. If this construction is a correct one there will be much "gnashing of teeth," etc.: "The people demand reform in a administration of government application of business principles to public affairs. As a means to this end civil service reform should be in good faith enforced. Our citizens have a right to protection from incompetency on the part of public employees who hold their places solely as a reward of partisan service and reform corruption influence of those who promise, and vicious methods of those who expect such rewards. And those who worthily seek public employment have the right to insist that merit and competency shall be recognized instead of party subserviency or surrender of honest political belief."

Why he will Vote for Maj. Morse.

"I shall be what you might call a 'mugwump' this spring, so far as the state ticket is concerned—not that I love the republican party less, but that I love Major Morse more," remarked Mayor Belknap this morning. "Major Morse and I were together on Gen. Sherman's staff at the battle of Mission Ridge. I met him that day when dashing across the field with a message. He was as white as a sheet, but all able to maintain his seat in the saddle, with his arm hanging limp and lifeless. 'Hello, Morse,' I called to him as I reigned up my horse as I passed, 'I guess you have lost your arm.' 'Yes,—it, and they can shoot off the other in so glorious a victory as this,' he responded. The enemy then were facing like sheep. I shall vote for the Major regardless of party affiliation."—[Grand Rapids Leader.

OFF FOR WASHINGTON.

President Cleveland's Quiet Departure from Albany.

President Cleveland and party—consisting of Mrs. Hoadley, Mrs. Cleveland, and wife, Miss Cleveland, Mrs. Hoyt, his married sister, and Mr. Hoyt, his brother-in-law, Mr. Manning and wife, Col. Lamont and wife, and Miss Hastings, a niece of the President elect—left Albany at 10 p. m. yesterday amid the evening of Monday, March 2. The secret as to their intended departure was closely kept, and very few knew of it until they were well on the journey. The party did not leave in a body, as was expected by the many who came to see them off, but it would appear that it would be arranged to drive to a telegraph station called Kenwood, about three miles below the city, where a special train consisting of a baggage car and the Pullman car of the New York Wagon Road Railroad was in waiting. The expectation was that the party would drive to the President's residence, and from there go to the depot by the two railroad companies, but he preferred to pay his own way.

EN ROUTE.

The Journey to the Capital.

The journey to Washington was a quiet and uneventful one. Mr. Cleveland was the most prominent of the party, and seemed to take matters very easily. Mrs. Cleveland looked well, and was quite vivacious, very modest, unassuming, and quite unlike the manner referred to at all. This was when Col. Lamont addressed Dan Macotta as "Mr. Secretary of the Treasury," and when Mr. Hoyt was called "Postmaster" a little not previously. There caused a general laugh at Lamont's expense, and he was quite chagrined the coming event was done away with. During the evening cards were produced, and the four gentlemen engaged in a game of euchre. This is Mr. Cleveland's favorite pastime, and it was evidently relished by him. The party reached Washington about half-past 6 o'clock in the morning. Even the station was deserted at that early hour, and the only people individuals who saw and recognized the President-elect were the employes of the road.

ARRIVAL AT WASHINGTON.

The President Declines a Public Reception.

At 7 o'clock on the morning of March 3d, when the news of what will close among the most memorable events of the year, and but few people were astir, the special train carrying the President-elect and his party flew on on the outbrake to the capital.

The committee of citizens appointed to Chairman Coleman to receive the President-elect had been informed by him that he desired to avoid all public demonstration, and had asked that no call from the committee be made. After delay of about ten minutes Chairman Bernard and Mr. Cox, of the Inaugural committee, put in an appearance and were introduced to the President-elect. Mr. Cleveland was then in his shirt sleeves, and looked refreshed. He was quite a party discussing, and it was 7:50 before the arrival of the party had spread, and a crowd had gathered around the Pullman car Marango and shook hands with the President-elect, who bore the scrutiny with equanimity. When the crowd thinned out the President-elect was escorted through the depot by Colling-room to the north entrance, the President-elect leading with Mrs. Cleveland on his arm, a hat pulled over eyes and silk hat, and did not appear to be at all fatigued by the long journey. Carriages were taken, and the party proceeded to the Ebbitt House, where a hot breakfast was served.

The Committee of Arrangements for the inauguration—Senator Sherman, Hanny, and Hessons—called at the Arlington at 7:30 and informed the President-elect of the day's programme and procedure, and presented him with the usual congratulations.

In the afternoon the sub-committee appointed by the Inauguration general reception committee to welcome the President-elect called on him for appointment. Their Chairman, Hon. Herbert Ward, of Washington, introduced members, congressmen, their wives, in a few well-chosen words, and the President-elect cordially returned his acknowledgment. Informal conversation ensued for some time, and the committee then individually took leave.

Mr. Arthur invited Mr. Cleveland to dine with him at the Arlington, but the latter said he had promised to wait until he was master of the White House, and had gone to the Ebbitt for the rest and lunch on the waiters table during the Executive Mansion, for he proved himself, and it was his own party in his own dining room.

On Wednesday, Mr. Cleveland received many orders, President Arthur sending the members. Mr. Hendricks also received a large number of callers at his rooms during the day.

DECORATIONS.

The City Puts On Its Gayest Attire.

A Washington correspondent says the city has put forth its gay in twenty years. Stars and stripes in full dress. From the Capitol to the Treasury building, from the Capitol to the White House, from the Capitol to the Treasury both sides of Pennsylvania avenue are alone with red, white and blue. In the decoration of the government buildings Mr. Lyons has been an untiring worker. The new department building shows no crack in its fine front, for it is covered with a mass of flags by day, drawn from points on the roof to the tops of the flagstaffs on the north and east fronts of the building, and the large pillars in the center of the building are covered with the national emblem, and streamers are hung from the windows. Across the way, the Riggs House is a mass of flags. The Corcoran Gallery is also in a fine story building on the corner where the processes which from Pennsylvania avenue and fifth Fifteenth street. That building is almost covered with flags, and the colors drop from the eaves downward and outward from the roof out of the flagstaff. The national flag is draped over every window in the building. Two immense flags almost thirty-five feet long hang down the sides of the building and will drop over the south of the building at the corner are two other flags of the same size. The Ebbitt House, the American Whitney-Hotel, over the entire front of which is a broad canvas of red, white, and blue are festooned, and the legend "Hail to the Chief" is spread over the door, one block further east is the Willard Hotel, the Metropolitan Hotel, the Arlington, large and elegantly decorated with the national colors and bearing a colossal size very poor portrait of the President-elect, the inscription (modern, Lincoln, and a few other public gentlemen) underneath.

Another block eastward, and on the south side of the avenue, the Pennsylvania Railroad has a very fine building, of which the ground floor is city-square, store with a specialty for opening entire. In Ogden most handsomely decorated building on the avenue, with its cornices, windows and forms of red and white bunting, bordered with gold stars and bordered with blue and white.

Further east, the National and Continental Hotels are covered for the whole lengths of their five stories and the whole length of their street frontage with flags and streamers and mottoes in bunting. Opposite the Willard, the new large building nearly every window has a wide of the avenue bears the national colors in some conceivable combination at almost every point where a decoration can be fastened on. Tomorrow's election and stands have been erected all along the line of march. Wherever there is a vacant lot there is a stand, and every store along the avenue have balconies built for the occasion capable of seating from ten to twenty persons. These balconies are generally in front of second-story windows, but in some cases they have been built outside, and even many very handsome and tasteful temporary carpentry work is covered with red, white and blue, and flags, streamers, and mottoes, and their decorations.

THE CROWD.

The Streets Densely Packed.

"The scenes on the streets of Washington are very animated," telegraphs a correspondent. "They are without parallel in the history of the city. Every fifteenth street on the avenue to the seat of the Capitol there is one dense, solid mass of humanity, and it is only with the strength which Hercules can with difficulty find their way. Sight-seers overflow the sidewalks, and those who are pushing and jostling in the throng. The rest of the visiting militia and civic organizations almost form a solid wall across columns of closely printed type. There are thousands of strangers in the streets. Bands are playing, and people from the different sections are being entertained by the music of the different bands. The inaugural ball is not a week or more in the hands which it will be. At every corner are Bands of Excursions, and the crowds are in the streets and are being entertained by the music and sounds. The crowd is hourly becoming more. The temperature is mild and the air is charged to the utmost. Private families are taking care of their friends. The crowds surge backward and forward on the avenue in the either, in the search of a place to get some food.

On Wednesday, Mr. Cleveland received many orders, President Arthur many of the members. Mr. Hendricks also received a large number of callers at his rooms during the day.

That building is almost covered with flags, and the colors drop from the eaves downward and outward from the roof out of the flagstaff. The national flag is draped over every window in the building. Two immense flags almost thirty-five feet long hang down the sides of the building and will drop over the south of the building at the corner are two other flags of the same size. The Ebbitt House, the American Whitney-Hotel, over the entire front of which is a broad canvas of red, white, and blue are festooned, and the legend "Hail to the Chief" is spread over the door, one block further east is the Willard Hotel, the Metropolitan Hotel, the Arlington, large and elegantly decorated with the national colors and bearing a colossal size very poor portrait of the President-elect, the inscription (modern, Lincoln, and a few other public gentlemen) underneath.

Another block eastward, and on the south side of the avenue, the Pennsylvania Railroad has a very fine building, of which the ground floor is city-square, store with a specialty for opening entire. In Ogden most handsomely decorated building on the avenue, with its cornices, windows and forms of red and white bunting, bordered with gold stars and bordered with blue and white.

Further east, the National and Continental Hotels are covered for the whole lengths of their Evarts, who were warmly greeted by a dozen or more acquaintances as they came in at the main door of the hall. Mr. Evarts and Judge were nominated the dock of Senator Garland. The only ladies present were Mrs. Cleveland and her sister, Mrs. Hoyt, who occupied a box. There were no breaks of applause which greeted the announcement of the passage of the bill for retirement bill, and the reception of the President's message nominating Gen. Grant to the newly created vacancy. The applause, which was very hearty and prolonged, was not unpleasant by Mr. Edmunds.

Just before the entry of the members at the Senate Young, armed in such simple black silk gowns and preceded by their mounted, the Senate and House of Representatives, the Supreme Court, performed by the veteran Chief Justice Chase, entered upon the light in front of the chair. President Arthur was now announced, and his coming was greeted with warm clapping of hands, in recognition of his fair bearing during the trying days of sorrow.

A moment later and the buzz of conversation was again suspended in anticipation of the announcement that the President elect of the United States, Mr. Cleveland, had already entered the hall with his escort and halted within the Senate chamber, while he arrived was announced. Applause, clapping of hands and shouts then followed, and greeted the successful man.

The Vice President elect was now escorted to the chair, and without delay, but with a solemnity and dignity befitting the occasion, he administered the oath of office to the President-elect.

Senator Edmunds now turned to the front and said:

Senators, we are now close upon another election. This brief period of our national life is devoted to the choice of a new Chief Magistrate, and also of a new Senate, and a political government. It is not, I suppose, in the power of any human agency to so all that we believe the best and most for our country, but it is in our power and most fortunate for our liberty, that we can, and do, and must, and will, and shall, and ought, and I may say for me to say that, in view of our country, and of the duty of the Senate of Congress can congratulate itself on being the Senate of the United States, and of the duty of the Senate of the United States, deliberate and thoroughly diligence which is the duty of the Senate, and which it is, and ought to be, and will be, and shall be, and ought to be, and will be, and shall be, and ought to be, and will be, and shall be

It is said that every member of the Illinois bar both drank and gambled when Judge David Davis first joined it. He having made up his mind to do neither, has outlived them all.

"The Modern Bartender's Guide" has just been issued by a New York publisher. The modern bartender doesn't need a guide so badly as the modern young man who patronizes a saloon.—Norristown Herald.

The liquorsellers of Brooklyn, N. Y., had a procession recently; the Black Maria, the penitentiary wagon, which had taken its cargo in as the procession came along, followed in its rear for about a mile very appropriately.

A Lafayette lady, a model wife and mother, broke her husband of the saloon habit by walking up to the bar beside him and calling for the beer. She broke the awful alliance as they walked home, with the remark, "I love you, my husband, and if you are going to hell I am going right along with you."

Whiskey impels the hand and nerves the heart of the murderer, and it has been denounced on nearly every gallows that ever was erected. It has impoverished, brutalized and disgraced millions, and it is continually adding to the store of agonies unspeakable reserved for generations yet to come.—[Chicago Herald.

Alcohol—Its Nature.

Alcohol is a narcotic poison. It has a pungent odor and a burning taste.

If it is taken into the stomach or injected into the veins in sufficient quantity it produces death.

Alcohol is not a product of vegetable growth, is never found in any fruit or grain, and can be obtained only by a chemical action which produces an entirely new substance.

The great French chemist, Fourcroy, says: "The formation of alcohol takes place at the expense of the destruction of the vegetable principle."

Turner, in his "Elements of Chemistry," says: "Alcohol does not exist ready formed in plants, but is a product of vinous fermentation."

Count Chaptel says: "Nature never forms spirituous liquors. She rots the grape upon the branch; but it is art which converts the juice into wine."

Alcohol—As a Food.

According to Dr. E. Johnson's analysis, "a glass of wine contains nutritious matter about equal to one-third of the flour contained in a single grain of wheat."

Dr. Lyons Playfair, professor of chemistry in the university of Edinburgh, analyzed a specimen of beer that had been advertised as highly nourishing, and reported that, of blood forming matter, it contained exactly one part in 1,666 parts.

Baron Liebig, in his "Chemical Letters," says: "We can prove with mathematical certainty, that as much food as can lie on the point of a table knife is more nutritious than eight quarts of the best Bavarian beer."

When fire taken, alcohol appears to give warmth and heat, but in a few minutes the temperature of the body falls, and the system is not as well able to resist the effects of cold as before.

Winter quenches thirst, becomes in the stomach a solvent of food, scourches the tissues, in fact is, according to Dr. Hargraves, the "chief agent in digestion, absorption, nutrition and secretion."

Alcohol retards digestion by hardening the food, and by destroying the solvent power of the gastric juice.

Animal experiments show that articles of good which ordinarily digest in from one to five hours, will remain in the stomach four or five times as long.

BAKING POWDER, Baking Powder, Baking Powder.

DR. G. W. CROUTER.

Queer People in the Kentucky Mountains.

The correspondent of the Louisville courier-journal, who has been investigating the Kentucky mountain plague, writes the following about some strange characters he met on his travels:

There are some queer characters among these mountaineers, and some who will bear study. I met one old fellow up near the head of Clover fork who is the possessor of about 2,500 acres of barren mountain land that will yet prove him stark mad. He is, to a certain extent, a crank, and the subject on which his brain is turned is silver. He believes that he has found the legendary and purely mythical Swift's silver mine, and that he is the owner of land that fairly teems with richness. He made me carry off several specimens for analysis, and has promised me a big interest in the mine if it should prove worth opening. He is an honest old fellow, and his word is as good as his bond, but he is clean daft on the silver mine question, and his neighbors say grows crazier every day.

Another queer one whom I met was an Irish philosopher who presides over the destinies of a lumber camp. His name is "Johnny" and he has brought from the outside world into this region a wealth of native humor combined with some of the most quaintly concrete and semi-wise sayings I ever heard.

Still another was a dare-devil logman I met one night. Sturdy, stalwart and dashing, with a capacity for "moonshine" unequaled by any of his fellows, he is just such a free, happy-go-lucky dare-devil as the mountain roads above, and it is a standing and uncontroverted saying that he has a sweetheart at every crossroads, and that scores of those susceptible creatures are ready to fall down and worship whenever their idol appears. He has a big heart and needs no introduction to show you that he is a man of noble, generous traits, even if his rough life has made him the scapegrace that he is.

Speaking of log-men, reminds me of a lumber camp I visited one Sunday on my up trip, and again one day coming back. It stood in a hollow, a rude, tumbledown frame shanty, open on all sides and in the roof, and with a floor so full of holes that it was a veritable dorlthrap for the unwary. About the shanty were strewn wagons and implements used in getting out the logs, while tethered around were a half-dozen or more yoke of oxen chewing their cuds as contentedly as if every day was one of a rest. We struck the place after the dinner hour. A note had been sent ahead for the cook to have us an excellent dinner of turkey, fish, beef, biscuit, etc., but it miscarried, and when we arrived we had to wait about two hours, and then dine on chicken and hot bread. We were rather in dirty quarters, but we were hungry and the cook was pretty careful, so we did full justice to the repast. These logmen lead a hard, but happy life, and seem to be as light-hearted as if they were millionaires and lived at ease in palaces, instead of poor devils whose days are spent in the roughest kind of work, and their nights in sleeping in rough bunks in dirty rough quarters. There is much to interest one in the logging business, from the cutting of the trees until they arrive at the mill, probably a hundred miles away. It gives employment to hundreds of men and animals, and annually brings thousands of dollars to the hills.

To Eat or be Eaten.

When a man and a bear meet together casualty is an American forest, it makes a great deal of difference, to the parties concerned at least, whether the bear eats the man or the man eats the bear. We haven't the slightest difficulty in deciding afterward which of the two, in each particular case, has been the eater, and which the eaten. Here, we say, is the grizzly that ate the man; or, here is the man that smoked and ate a piece of the hams of the grizzly. Being our opinion upon such familiar and well-known instances, we are apt to take it for granted far too readily that between eating and being eaten, between the active and the passive voice of the verb eat, there exists necessarily a profound and impassible native antithesis. To swallow an oyster, in our own personal histories, so very different a thing from being swallowed by a shark that we can hardly realize at first the underlying fundamental identity of eating with mere euskomopse. And yet, at the very outset of the art of feeding, when the nascent animal first began to indulge in this very essential animal practice, one may fairly say that no practical difference at yet existed between the creature that ate and the creature that was eaten. After the man and the bear had finished their little meal, if one may be frankly metaphorical, it was impossible to decide whether the remaining being was the man or the bear, or which of the two had swallowed the other. The dinner having been purely mutual, the results being animal represented both the litigants equally; just as, in Cannibal New Zealand, he chief who ate up his brother chief was held naturally to inherit the goods and chattels of the vanquished and absorbed rival, whom he had thus literally and physically incorporated.—Grant Allen, in Popular Science Monthly for February.

Perhaps no nation of the earth is more in need of a little wholesome invasion by the advocates of its civilizations than the United States, notwithstanding the fact that there is no other nation that guarantees as many rights and secures to many privileges to its myriad factors.—Chicago Inter-Ocean.

The Man and the Horse.

As regards speed for a mile or two, or even several miles, there can be no comparison between the pace of a horse and that of a man on a bicycle. The horse is far and away the speedier; but after about 20 or 25 miles the horse, it seems, begins to come back to the man. The relative speed of horse and man, quite unencumbered by weight, has never been tried, as it is always necessary either to ride or drive a horse when he is being tried. But in comparing the best times on record of a trotting horse driven in a light gig, as is the fashion in America, and a man riding and propelling a 27-pound bicycle, the conditions, taking the relative strength of the contestants into consideration, may be thought tolerably equal. Maud S., Mr. Vanderbilt's celebrated horse, trotted one mile in 2:09; the champion time for a bicycle is 2:25. Leaving out intermediate distances, I find that Lady Mack did 5 miles in 13:00; Mr. Hillier has ridden 8 on a bicycle in 14:18. Consider did 10 miles in 22:34; Mr. English accomplished that distance in 29:19 3-5. Twenty miles was done by the horse Captain McGowan in 58:22; Mr. English, who holds the record for 20 miles, accomplished it in 59:06 3-5. Twenty miles well within the hour must surely be looked on as a wonderful performance. But after 20 miles the man rapidly begins to go to the front. Thirty miles on record stand to the horse by Ariel in 3:55:00; But Jon Keith-Falconer rode that distance on a bicycle in 2:45:58 3-5. Conqueror traveled 100 miles in 8:35:33; F. R. Fry, on a bicycle, did 100 miles in 5:59:05 3-5. The same distance, 100 miles, was done on the high road by George Smith in 7:11:16. The other times mentioned were performed on the cinder path. No trial has been recorded for a horse beyond 100 miles. But a tricyclist has ridden 221½ miles in 24 hours, and a few weeks ago a performer on a newly invented half-two-wheeled machine of strange appearance, called a kangaroo, traveled 240 miles within the same time. It is therefore plain that in staying power a man on a bicycle, or even on a tricycle, which is a much heavier machine, not primarily adapted for racing, is infinitely superior to a horse. Probably up to 25 miles the best horse would beat the best bicyclist; but after that distance the horse would, in pugilistic phrase, never see the way his adversary went.—Fortnightly Review, in the Nineteenth Century.

A New Use For the Frog.

A new use for the frog has been discovered. A medical correspondent of the Lancet says that, finding the treatment of granulating wounds by skin-grafting is in country practice liable to fail into disuse through the unwillingness of patients to part with the little bit of skin necessary, he hesitatingly been induced to try experiments with other substances as a substitute for human grafts. As the outcome of these experiments he finds that blood-skin from a decapitated frog make grafts which admirably answer all purposes, forming a source of supply always at hand in the country, except during the winter months, and being easily applied on account of their uniformity in thickness, and the necessitating no pain to suffering humanity. The skin of a single frog yields grafts for an enormous extent of surface, and preserves its vitality so long that, if the patient is at a distance, the portion of skin required can be carried by the messenger lying in pocket for an hour or more without injury, provided it be wrapped in gutta-percha or other waterproof tissue to prevent drying. The frog is so extensively used for experimental purposes by surgical savants that the appropriation of its skin for the cure of some of human beings whose own skins require renewal is not a proceeding in which it can reasonably object, more especially as it is decapitated before being thus utilized. The public, however, would be interested to hear a little more about these frog-grafts before adopting them generally. Does the skin of the frog when grafted retain its peculiarities? The point is of some importance, as the appearance of a person in a speckled frog-skin would hardly be prepossessing. May not frog-grafting also wait to an increase of tadpolism?—Pall Mall Gazette.

A Blue-Eyed Girl's Grandpa.

Among the passengers on the steamship State of Georgia, which arrived yesterday, was D. S. Patterson, an aged and psychical carpet weaver, totally blind. He carefully felt his way with a knotted cane down the gangplank of one of the immigrant ships at Castle Garden, and just as he reached the wharf all the brown-haired, blue-eyed girl threw her arms about his neck, and said: "Oh, grandpa!" The old man kissed and hugged her until he was tired. Then she took hold of the big fore-finger of his left-handed right hand, and led him away. He stopped every now and then, and rather crinkled her unstrained demeanor by picking her up and kissing her. She was the old man's grandchild, Sarah Ferguson, and she had come alone all the way from North Platte, Neb., to take him to her father and mother there. He had gone on a train of the Erie Road at Jersey City.—New York Sun.

Democratic Nominations.

For Justice of the Supreme Court,
ALLEN B. MORSE.

For Regents of the University,
CHARLES R. WHITMAN.
MOSES W. FIELD.

His War Record.

Allen B. Morse, the democratic and national nominee for supreme justice of the state of Michigan, at the breaking out of the war for the union, was a student at law in the office of Wells & Wells, at Ionia, Michigan.

When the old third regiment was being organized, he, with others, got up a company, which used to drill in what was then known as Merritt's hall. The company was unable to get a place in the third and disbanded. July 30, 1861, Morse, then in his 22d year, enlisted as a private in Co. H of Stoughton's Bohemian regiment, afterwards known as the 16th Michigan infantry. He served as a private and sergeant in that regiment until December 16, 1862, when he was transferred to the 21st Michigan infantry as 1st Lieutenant of Co. I.

While with the 16th infantry he never lost but three days from duty by sickness or any other cause. Was in the seige before Yorktown and in the seven days fight before Richmond. Also participated with his regiment in the battle of Hanover Court House, Pope's battle of Manassas, Antietam and Shepardstown Ford and numerous skirmishes. Wherever his command went he carried a musket with it.

While in the western army, he was in the battles Chickamunga and Mission Ridge, losing his arm in the latter fight. He became adjutant of his regiment February 3, 1863. While acting as such, he was detailed as acting assistant adjutant general of the first brigade of Sheridan's division commanded by F. T. Sherman, and was upon his staff when wounded. Although losing his left arm Nov. 25, 1863, he remained in active service, after a short furlough, until September 16, 1864.

When retiring from the position of assistant adjutant general, he received a very flattering testimonial to his worth as a soldier and an officer from his brigade commander, which was indorsed by Gen. Sheridan, as follows:

HEADQUARTERS 2D. DIVISION,
4TH ARMY CORPS.
Louden, Tenn., Feb. 11, 1864.

I take great pleasure in approving the wishes and recommendations of Col. Sherman. Lieut. Morse, while in my division, proved himself to be an able, efficient and gallant officer, and was wounded while leading his men in the storming of Mission Ridge.

P. H. SHERIDAN,
Maj. General.

It will be seen that Allen B. Morse was one of the earliest in the service, that he experienced the perils and hardships of war both as a private soldier and an officer, and bears the honorable scars of service won in his country's defense. He is entitled to the support of his comrades. He is a member of the Grand Army of the Republic, and as an orator has been repeatedly called upon by the old soldiers to lead in the patriotic services on decoration day and the fourth of July.

In this vicinity, he will command the almost unanimous vote of his old comrades, and we commend him to the old soldiers everywhere. The defenders of the nation in its supreme hour of peril are growing fewer every year. They are worthy of all honor. Here and now is the opportunity to place one of them in a position of trust and honor.

If worthy as a citizen of the place, the soldiers should see to it that he attains it.—[Ionia Standard.

Cooley and the Corporations.

A recent issue of the Detroit Evening News gives the record of the Hon. Judge Cooley in the matter of decisions for or against corporations as opposed to private citizens. The News has taken the Michigan supreme court reports for the last five years, and had them examined carefully by a competent lawyer, and gives a detailed statement of the number of cases, by volumes.

The record embraces all the cases in the last five years thus far reported, in which railroads, car companies, boom companies, mining companies, or corporations analogous to common carriers were concerned as against private citizens pleading for justice for injury done to life, limb or property, or defending themselves against corporate greed and aggression. A recapitulation shows a singular preponderance of decisions by the supreme court in favor of corporations:

Total corporation cases in five years	112
Decided in favor of the corporations	93
Decided against	19
Total railroad cases	89
Decided in favor of railroad	72
Decided against railroad	17

Separating the cases in which Mr. Justice Cooley wrote the opinions, the record becomes still more significant:

Total corporation opinions by Cooley	31
In favor of corporations	30
Against corporations	1
Total railroad opinions by Cooley	26
In favor of railroads	19
Against	1

This record hardly needs comment.

Of course it is possible that out of 115 cases in which corporations were concerned the corporations were right in 93 cases; that out of 88 cases against railroads there were but 16 in which those much abused concerns were at fault. It is even within the bounds of possibility to imagine that out of the 31 corporation cases in which Justice Cooley wrote the deciding opinions he could find law against the corporations but once, and that in 20 railroad cases written by the same learned jurist the railroads were right in all but 1 solitary case. We say it is possible to imagine this. We hardly think, however, that the people of Michigan, at the April election, will stretch their imaginative faculties to so dangerous a degree.

Perfectly Non-Partisan.

Cooley is not a partisan candidate in any sense of the word. He is not a prohibitionist, for he don't believe in it. He is not a democrat, for he has always acted against that party in this state. He is not a republican for he voted against Hayes in 1876, and against Blaine in 1884.

What is he, then?

Look at his record in deciding corporation cases before the supreme court. That tells what he is.

He is a railroad attorney who by some mistake has got upon the supreme bench as judge, and in that capacity he is unrivalled. Had he tried his thirty-one corporation cases as a paid attorney for the corporation, pleading his cause before the bar like other attorneys, he never could have won thirty of them as he did in trying them as judge upon the bench.

His nomination was a great day for the railroads, and it was worked most elegantly.—[Evening News.

Concise Record of the Week.

EASTERN.

An earthquake at Lancaster, Pa., shook buildings and threw plates from tables. Services were suspended in the churches until the shock subsided.

A congress of churches, embracing all Christian denominations, will be held at Hartford, Conn., early in May.

The Directors of the New York Central flood report that owing to the snow blockade nothing was earned on the stock during February. The balance for the quarter was $676,000, out of which $90,224 was appropriated for a dividend of 1 per cent.

Murray Hill Church, at New York, is about to retire Dr. Burchard, of "Rum, Romanism, and Rebellion" notoriety, on a salary of $5000 per annum, and secure a younger, and more energetic pastor.

Nearly six thousand pounds of nitroglycerine exploded at a factory three miles south of Bradford, Pennsylvania. Two men were killed, one of them being scattered in fragments all over the neighborhood. The site of the building is marked by an immense hole in the ground.

New York dispatches of the 11th inst. report a marked improvement, though only a temporary one, it is feared, in Gen. Grant's condition. "His physicians attribute this improvement to a change in remedies. Up to yesterday they have depended upon anodynes to give him the needed repose. These interfered with his digestion, aggravated his stomach weakness, and left him weaker every day. Stimulation was resorted to, and, although the patient expressed great distaste for anything alcoholic, its use has been followed by the happy effect described. While his physicians do not expect any permanent improvement, they are hopeful that the refreshing strength of the patient will so lessen his digestive functions that he will be able to resist the increase of his disease perhaps for months."

Mrs. Willie Henderson, 23 years old, the pretty wife of a prominent farmer at West Shelby, N. Y., blew out her brains.

Fire in Gill's art store at Springfield, Mass., damaged pictures, statuary, books, and brica-brac $50,000.

WESTERN.

The Governor of Kansas has signed the new temperance bill, which requires that citizens shall appear before the County Attorney and testify under oath as to their knowledge of the purchase and sale of liquor, thus doing away with the grand jury investigations as the method.

Three of the convicts who escaped from the Michigan State Prison were tracked through the snow from Mosherville to Jackson, and hungry, and sent back to serve out their sentences.

The action taken by Congress in its closing hurry with regard to the Oklahoma operations was hardly fair. The Western Representatives defeated the Jones bill which had passed the Senate, and the Ryan amendment to the Indian bill was adopted, directing the President to enter into negotiations with the Indians with a view to opening Oklahoma to settlement. The question as to whether these negotiations shall be opened through the agency of a commission or not is left to the President's discretion. Ryan and other friends of the settlers think that the negotiations will result in the opening of the lands to colonists.—Adjutant from the Wear sisters, Capt. Crook and Gen. Hatch have left Wichita, Kan., for the border of Indian Territory, the former to confer with the colonists assembling there and the latter to station his troops to prevent the contemplated movement toward Oklahoma."

Advices from Indian Territory report that consumption is an epidemic issue in decimating the Osage Indians.

What was supposed to be an infernal machine was found in the Union freight depot at Cleveland. When tested it failed to explode, and is alleged to have been placed in position by a discharged employe.

The Governor of Dakota has vetoed the capital removal bill. This delays the release, as the bill passed obtain the constitutional majority necessary to pass it over the veto.

During 1884, the gross earnings of the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul Road were $21,126,028, and the gross expenses $13,350,628. The bonded debt of the line is $30,000,000, and the total stock amounts to $47,445,714. The company operates 4,856 miles, no part of which is built upon leases, and constructed but forty-four miles of new road last year. Comparatively the gross earnings show a falling off of $180,000.

Dispatches from the West and Southwest report that the strike on the third roads is assuming an alarming phase. The strike, which seems to be pretty general, extends along the Missouri Pacific road and its branches in the States of Missouri, Kansas, and Texas. The Governor of Missouri sent by up coal train to Sedalia seven companies of St. Louis militia, with a Gatling gun, to keep in check the striking rangers. There were seventy engines in the yards at Sedalia, and twenty-five loaded freight cars on the side-tracks. The strikers adopted a peaceable demeanor, trying to keep the peace at all landings.

At the annual meeting of the Missouri Pacific and Iron Mountain Railroad, at St. Louis Board of Directors were elected. The surplus earnings of the Missouri Pacific were stated to be $1,270,750, and of the Iron Mountain route $3,464,906, from both of which, however, taxes and fixed charges are to be deducted.

Forty-nine Oneida children from the reservation at Green Bay passed through Chicago for the training school at Marimburg, Pa.

Fourteen merchants and the leading banker in the town were found by the police in gambling rooms at Harvard, Ill. All were bound over for trial.

Nellie Horne, of Whitewater, Wis., has been acquitted of the charge of poisoning her sister.

Mrs. Mark Hopkins, wife of the St. Clair (Mich.) millionaire, has begun suit for divorce on the ground of cruelty.

A Cleveland newspaper, the Herald, will soon disappear. It has been purchased by two of its correspondents. The circulation and good-will go to the Leader, while the material and machinery will be used by the Plain-Dealer for a morning edition.

SOUTHERN.

Three persons were killed and a dozen injured eight miles south of Grenada, Miss., on the Illinois Central Road by a collision between a mail-train and an express train. Both were running at full speed, and the engines, two baggage cars, one mail-car, and a smoker were wrecked.

A young woman of Nashville, Tenn., has been alternately restored to health by the "faith cure" after four members of regular Illinois.

The Central Hotel and twenty homes and stores at Newtown, N. C., were burned, entailing a loss of $180,000.

For Killing A. H. Murphy in the street some time ago Pat Ford and John Murphy have been sentenced at New Orleans to imprisonment, Judge Lewis, W. E. Cantrell, and William H. Barkley, who participated in the assassination of Murphy, were sentenced to twenty years' imprisonment. An appeal will be made to the Supreme Court.

WASHINGTON.

Gen Weaver, of Iowa, and the Hon. Sidney Clarke, of Kansas, interviewed President Arthur on the other day in behalf of the Oklahoma colonists. Mr. Clarke urged that these people were law-abiding citizens, who only desired to obtain their right to settle upon lands which had been bought and paid for by the United States long ago. A large amount of information was laid before the President showing that the whole of Oklahoma is now illegally occupied by cattle companies, and that it would have been opened to settlement long ago had it not been for fraud and conspiracy between dishonest public officials and the cattle syndicate. The conclusion Mr. Clarke asked the President to withdraw the United States troops. Gen. Weaver argued that the settlers, far from being the desperadoes they are painted, were among the most patriotic citizens of Iowa, Nebraska, Illinois, Kansas, and other States, who were anxious to go to Oklahoma to make homes. The invocation of the military power then in use to Secretary of the Navy. In Secretary Lincoln's office, where Gen. Sheridan and staff and other army officers were assembled, the oath was administered to Mr. Bathbert. Attorney General Garland was sworn into office at the Department of Justice. From the Department of Justice the party went to the Postal Union Treasury Department, where Secretary Manning took the oath. Soon after Secretary Manning had qualified all the bureau officers and chiefs of division visited his office and paid their respects. Secretary Lamar and Postmaster General Vilas were also sworn into office. In the various departments the retiring Secretaries has the pleasure of shaking hands with their successors, and complimented them upon their election.

Mr. Edward D. Clark, Mr. Lamar's selection for Assistant Secretary of the Interior, says a Washington dispatch, is an active lawyer of Vicksburg, Miss., 39 years of age. He is said to have built up a large practice through his own exertions, and to have never before been in public life. Mr. Lamar thinks he has will prove to be a very efficient executive officer. He is not known generally in the Southern politicians.

An application was made to Postmaster General Vilas by Vice President Hendricks for the appointment of a friend of the latter to the superintendency of free delivery at the Chicago postoffice. The answer was to the effect that the department would not interfere with the duties of the Postmaster at Chicago. Mr. Hendricks is engaged in a struggle with Senator Cullom, from Illinois, for the appointment of a postmaster at Indianapolis, with the chances against the Vice President.

Prominent Democrats are urging the appointment of Joseph S. Miller, of West Virginia, as Commissioner of Internal Revenue. Mr. Pecore, who gave Washington reporters the information that he was to be appointed clerk of the treasury, was detached from his indorsement for the place, and Eugene Hagelin, of Illinois, has been installed.

The Republican State Convention of Michigan renominated Judge Cooley on the Supreme bench, and placed in the field for Regents of the University Charles S. Draper and Judge A. V. McAlly.

LATER NEWS ITEMS.

The Chinese are reported to have lost 17,000 men during the defense of Keelung. The French captured immense quantities of military stores.

The British Cabinet, after a long session, decided to warn Russia that England is bound to protect Afghan territory.

A bill has been produced in the Belgian House of Representatives imposing heavy duties on cereals, flour and meat, beasts, cattle, sheep, and hogs.

The wife of Caspar Harmicely, of Lexington, Ohio, disappeared recently, and Hannibal was arrested, charged with her abduction, and in the jail attempted to kill himself.

Mrs. Minnie Peck, who was the wife of Homer Cobb, son of Abina Cobb, the Cleveland millionaire, is accused of kidnapping her little boy from Cleveland, and to have taken him to Brooklyn. Elmer Cobb, who had separated from his wife, believing her to be unfaithful, commenced suicide, and when his putative child was born he was placed with foster-parents. Abina Cobb, father of Elmer, died suddenly without having a will, and a suit is now pending to make Elmer's child a joint heir to the grandfather's estate. Hence the mother's interest in getting control of her child.

The famous Mexican Band, now at New Orleans, has been given a reception by visit St. Louis in June, where it will assist at the opening of the Music Hall in the Exposition Building.

The Cleveland Plain Dealer Publishing Company has purchased a controlling interest in the Herald of that city, which action will result in the total wiping out of the latter newspaper.

The Catholic Church of St. Dominick, in Washington, was damaged by fire to the amount of $7,000.

A telegram from Troy, Tenn., says: Andrew Young, Charles Lethans, and Frank Freeman, all negroes, arrested yesterday, charged with being implicated in the murder of Montgomery, near the state line, two in counties, were under guard in Union City last night. A mob of 100 overpowered the guards, took the prisoners, and hanged them just outside of the city. Their corpses were found this morning suspended from a tree.

J. S. Spafford, of Whitesside County, Ill., has been nominated by the Republicans to fill the vacancy in the Legislature caused by the death of Representative B. E. Ingham.

In the Hazen court-martial at Washington it was stated that he had criticised the action of the Secretary of War regarding the Grizzly expedition, and that he had said that if a military court had been asked to their rescue the party might have been saved. He is suspended from duty, and minimal disrespect to his superior officer.

About twenty Oklahoma boomers were brought to Wichita, Kan., last week and were arraigned before Commissioner Sherman. They all gave bail in $2,000 each for their appearance at the September term of the United States Court. They are supposed to belong to Arkansas (O), where the boomers are concentrating their forces.

The Republicans of interest in the Senate on the 12th inst., was the consideration of Senator Van Wyck's resolution, offered by him on the 4th inst., directing the Secretary of the Navy to inform the Attorney General to take up the Mexican Central Railroad, which was sold at the Mobile and Gulf Railroad, Indian Transit Company of Mexico, and Mr. Van Wyck's contention was that the sale was illegal, and that it was a fraud on the Mexican Government and on the bondholders of the road, and that the Attorney General should take steps to have the sale set aside. The resolution was adopted without the discussion, and Senator Van Wyck said that the sale was made between Wallace and Jackson, the former being the President of the Mexican Central Railroad, and the latter being President of the Indian Transit Company of Mexico. The road was sold for $1,000,000, and Senator Van Wyck said that the bonds alone were worth $2,000,000, and that the road was worth $20,000,000. Senator Van Wyck said that the road was in the hands of a receiver appointed by the Mexican Government, and that the bondholders in the United States were being robbed of their property. Senator Hoar said that the Attorney General had already taken steps to have the matter investigated, and that the resolution was adopted.

A RESOLUTION offered by Mr. Hoar that Mr. Pendleton be excused from the Committee on Foreign Relations, was taken up in the Senate on the 12th inst., and a very long argument ensued. The Republicans wished to elect the Senator from New Hampshire will succeed Mr. Lamar, and the Democrats were opposed to the point whether, in this emergency, the Senate should elect a Democrat to fill the vacancy, and whether a vacancy had really occurred which the Senate could fill. The Democratic patriotic interest was developed in the debate, Mr. Hoar stating that the Senate had confirmed 1,000 Democratic appointments to vacant places in Illinois and Oregon. After the debate the resolution was agreed to—yeas 36, nays 29. The only departure from direct party lines was made by Senator Cameron of Pennsylvania, who joined in the affirmative with the Republicans. The only Democrat who voted with Mr. Hoar. The debate had begun on the Senate's memorial from the Governor of Arizona asking the Constitutional Convention of the United States District Court. Referred.

CHARLEVOIX, . . . MICHIGAN.

Shall the County Seat be Removed?

On the county-seat question, Charlevoix is no more selfish than any other town would be under similar circumstances. She will keep it as long as she can, and when it must be removed, she will probably seek to put it where it will be most convenient to her business. If, as now seems probable, we are to have a railroad through East Jordan to Ironton, and on to Charlevoix, in a few months, no more convenient place could be given us outside our borders than East Jordan, except of course, it might by some chance go to Ironton. If the eastern half of the county want the county seat at East Jordan and are ready to erect permanent buildings, they have only Charlevoix and the extreme west to contend with now; while, on the other hand, if this move is simply one of "spite," as has been alleged, and the intent is to keep it moving, then, in the light of conveniences for travel, business, etc., (especially if this railroad should be built) there would be not only Charlevoix and the west end, but South Arm and a large portion of the south half to overcome. Can they do it? Reference to the table of population in this issue will show that the township of Charlevoix, Eveline, Marion, Norwood, South Arm, and at least one-half of Hayes and Wilson would oppose a removal from East Jordan with considerable more than half the entire population of the county, saying nothing of the impossibility of securing ten supervisors to permit it to be again submitted to the people.

Until the people are ready to erect permanent county buildings, let them consider the propriety of moving away from the very commodious and complete offices now furnished them practically free. No repairs, no insurance, no expense of anykind except to supply such office furniture as is from time to time needed to keep pace with the increasing business of the county.

Here is a court room unsurpassed (we are informed) by any in this circuit for capacity and convenience, here is a jail built to hold prisoners beyond any possibility of escape, and large enough for any ordinary demand; here are well-lighted, well-heated, convenient offices, sufficient for the use of the county for a number of years,—all practically free. Now are the tax payers ready to say: These are not enough; we want offices and buildings of our own; built and paid for by the whole county. Do the taxpayers feel so rich that they want to build? If not, then why move out of a good house until another is provided for?

Population of Charlevoix.

Since publishing the census last year, we have had frequent calls for copies of the same. That date of the paper being now out of print, we give the figures another insertion, with the census of 1874 added, for comparison. The figures for 1874 and 1880 are from the Red Book of Michigan, and for 1884 from the county clerk:

Parliamentary Rules.

We have recently received from the publishers, the Review and Herald, Battle Creek, Mich., a copy of "Smith's Diagram of Parliamentary Rules," showing the relation of any motion to every other motion, and answering at a glance over five hundred questions in parliamentary practice. The work is designed for all who may be called upon to preside over business meetings, all who ever have occasion to take part in business proceedings, and all who may wish to inform themselves on parliamentary rules. By an ingeniously devised system of diverging and converging lines, all the rules applying to any given motion, and all the motions coming under any given rule, are presented at one view, furnishing to a chairman instant information on any point upon which doubts may arise. Size of diagram 12½ x 6½ inches. A key is supplied, containing full explanations, hints, and directions for conducting deliberative proceedings, the whole put up in neat covers, convenient and durable for pocket use. Many who have used Cushing's and Jefferson's manual, take this and after examination pronounce it the best. Most flattering testimonials are published from Ex-Gov. Jerome, Ex-Senator Ferry, Hon. J. W. Keifer, Ex-Speaker of the U. S. house of representatives, Hon. D. H. Crossman, clerk of the Michigan house of representatives, and hundreds of others of like experience, all of whom pronounce it the most simple and most practical work of the kind ever published. Single copies by mail, postpaid, 50 cents.

The cabinet which Mr. Cleveland has selected is a very strong one at every point. There is not a dangerous or uncertain element in it. It is not only full of brains, but it is also full of that moderation and steady business ability best suited to manage the affairs of a great nation, whose chief interest is to have peace abroad and social order and economical administration at home. Bayard will be a strict constructionist of the Monroe doctrine in foreign policy, and will thus avoid complications; Garland will be a liberal constructionist of the constitution in domestic policy, and thus avoid anything like a revival of Colhounism in a democratic administration; Manning is a man of solid business ability for the treasury, and a very shrewd political adviser; Endicott has good abilities, and will give tone to the administration as war minister; Vilas and Whitney are young and brilliant men, and the latter will have ample opportunity to exhibit his business talents in the rebuilding of the navy; while Lamar will typify the completeness reconciliation of the sections, and bring to the administration the superior equipment and experience in public affairs, the most sterling integrity, and the very highest order of ability. It is a cabinet of all the talents, and many of the virtues; but it will have to deal with a congress of all the stupidities and many of the vices.—[Evening News.

The grand old party in this state is demoralized. It has named as its standard bearer a man who says he has not been a republican for six or eight years, and who accepted the nomination of the prohibition party. It is only a few months since the executive republican began to turn his hair at the mere mention of the words "mugwump" or "prohibitionist," but as a dose necessary to success the party has swallowed with a smile a double dose of mugwumpism and prohibitionism which at any previous period in its history it would have spurned.

Otis Fuller, editor of the St. Johns Republican, pays the following compliment to Hon. A. B. Morse of Ionia, fusion candidate for justice of the supreme court: "In the selection of Hon. Morse of Ionia, for judge of the supreme court, the democrats have brought out a brave soldier, a good lawyer and a thoroughly popular gentleman. The republicans can win in the coming campaign only by bringing forward a man of the people with an equally good record."

Hon. S. A. Strong, who was a delegate to the late prohibition state convention, and is an ardent prohibitionist, says the nomination of Judge Cooley by his party as a candidate for judge of the supreme court, was a sell out to the republican party brought about by the shrewd management of a few leading prohibitionists working in the interest of the republicans, and that but a few of the delegates suspected the nature of the transaction until after the nomination had been made, and the convention had adjourned. It was then, of course, too late to remedy the matter, but Mr. Strong says that while the sale has been consummated the shrewd managers of the scheme will not be able to deliver the goods, and he does not believe a majority of the prohibitionists will support the ticket placed in nomination.—[Kalamazoo Gazette.

Said one of the most prominent republican politicians in the state to the writer the other day: "You have nominated a magnificent candidate in Allen B. Morse for justice of the supreme court. There isn't a squirrel or better man in the state than the gallant major. He has a profound love of justice, possesses real mental acumen, and is entirely free from corporate influences. He would make a pure, able and patriotic member of the supreme court.—[Lansing Journal.

Mr. Cleveland's policy is still uncertain, but it is rapidly assuming a definite shape. There is too much conservatism in it to please the majority of his party. "One thing has been developed," said Congressman Van Eaton of Mississippi this morning. "That came out at the first meeting of Cleveland's cabinet. The discovery was then made that they had found their master. Cleveland is to be the president."—[Press Dispatch.

Veterans of the war, and members of the G. A. R. have this spring a chance to show whether they have a love for their fellow-soldier, or whether organization is simply for political purposes. Allen B. Morse is on record as being as brave a soldier as ever went through a fight, and left an arm on a southern battle field. If you love your comrade, give him your vote.

At the spring election every growbacker in Michigan must choose between a soft-money, one armed ex-soldier democrat and a high tariff, hard-money corporation republican attorney. No one doubts that the people of Michigan will elect Major Morse.—[Lansing Sentinel (Greenback).

Deadlocks at the Capitol.

It is wonderful how many respectable statesmen one meets at Washington. The leading lyceum of the city told me the other day that he had been asked for 25 cents to buy a ticket to see one of a former president not long ago, and every day I see about the hotels here great men's sons, whose fathers are dead, leading the lives of decent adventurers. One had a father who long stood at the head of the bar of the country, and another's father was in the senate, and held a place in Zach Taylor's cabinet. The little old man there, who goes about with his shoulders stooping and his form clad in the mustiness of a dressing gown, was, at the beginning of the war, one of the leaders of Washington, and he has been the second in chief in which senators fought sonators. Once fortunate and wealthy, he has a necessity at any big social gathering. Now he is glad to take a drink with a messenger, and, like Beau Hickman, lives by his wits. There, on the opposite seat in the hotel lobby, is a well-dressed man who has the title of a judge, and who once held an important office in our diplomatic service. He has hobnobbed with states men and presidents, but he will borrow a dollar of you if you will let him, and is far from adverse to drinking without asking the politeness of the man who treats. Last night I asked him how he liked the climate of the country in which he was located as minister. I was sitting on the sofa beside him, and though I was not much acquainted with him we dropped into conversation. In reply to the above he said with the most winning smile imaginable: "Ah, the climate! It was delightful. I am not very particular about the climate. I can live in any country, and I always enjoy myself. There are many pleasant things everywhere. I always find them. I enjoy life. I can do anything, in fact—" and here he looked me straight in the eye—"I can take a drink!"

I received his gaze without flinching, and my eye did not give a response, and after fully three seconds, he said in a sad tone: "Ah! but you don't drink."

"No," I replied; "it does not agree with me." There was an awkward pause, and then the talk went on as though nothing had happened.—Washington Cor. Cincinnati Gazette.

A preacher's wife of three years' standing says that she would like to have her husband go as a foreign missionary thus to be a pastor. She declares that she could stand the heathen in foreign lands better than she can endure the cranky men and officious women in the churches. Since we come to think of it, we are most serious that we do sometimes get some rather troublesome people into our churches.—Richmond (Va.) Religious Herald.

A Celestial Tramp.

Encke's comet, whose return has been announced by the astronomers, is by no means a stranger. He is as really a part of the solar system as Mars or the earth, and all these centuries has been making his revolutions about the sun, passing and repassing our world with great frequency. Although often seen, this comet was unable to attract attention until 1818. During that year a comet was observed by the astronomer Pons whose motion could not be reconciled with the supposition of a parabolic orbit. Arago remarked that its elements were much like those of a comet which appeared in 18 and others, by a similar comparison, identified it with a comet seen in 1759. Encke found that the observations might all be satisfied by supposing the comet to move in an elliptical orbit, with a period of between three and four years. With a marvelous ingenuity he computed the perturbations effected in all the planets with the exception of Uranus and the Asteroids. He found that the comet moved in an elongated ellipse, the major axis of which was about 360,000,000 miles in length, and the minor axis not more than half the length of the former. In other words, the comet, instead of being a visitor from the great spaces between the solar system and the stars, was found to move in an orbit the extremity of which was 190,000,000 miles this side of Jupiter and nine times less remote than the planet Neptune. The proximate period of its revolution—1,207 days, or about three and one-fifth years.

A peculiar interest attaches to this meteor from the fact that Encke proved, or seemed to prove, that the planetary hull on this mass of matter would not fully satisfy the problem. He supposed, and made allowance for his calculations, a resisting medium contrary to all the theories of the interplanetary spaces hitherto entertained. The comet's period is shorter at each return than before. By a paradox not beyond explanation the friction, which would be supposed to lengthen the period of revolution, on the contrary lessens when is called the centrifugal force, and draws the whole orbit into a smaller space about the sun. At all events, this is the reasoning of astronomers. They predict that ultimately the comet, sweeping around the sun in a constantly-diminishing orbit, will fall into the great luminary, as its insignificant atom of the fixed with which the sun is supplied from day to day from the interstellar and other drift-wood of limitless space.

That there may be a resisting medium in space which affects a comet but does not affect the planets, whose revolution has not sensibly changed since observations were first made, is regarded as not improbable from the attenuity of this medium, which to an attenuated mass like a comet would prove to be a measurable retarding power, while to a ponderous globe the resistance would be too small to become visible in a few thousands of years. Encke's comet is called the "short-period comet." Its period is less than any other. It is a small and commonplace affair. But if people will be patient one will arrive shortly presently just a little more worthy of judge attention. Faye's comet, which visited this neighborhood in 1878, is due in eleven months, or in February, 1886. Not improbably in the meantime some conspicuous meteor of this order may be visible in the heavens.

Just From Dakota.

A young woman with compact frame and a fresh complexion arrived at the Rock Island depot the other day from the North. She got right out of the car without any foolishness and walked toward the street. As she reached the sidewalk she set her big satchel down with a dull thud and stood a moment looking around, as if it uncertainly. A big porter asked her if he should not carry her trap to a hack driver made a reach for it.

"Drop that!" said she to the latter, kicking it out of his hands, and as he stood back respectfully she turned to the porter and observed: "I can carry anything that you can, thank you."

Just then a gentleman came around the corner, and, seeing what he supposed was an outrageous attempt on the part of the men to impose on an unsophisticated girl, rushed up and grabbed the satchel.

"Come on, miss," said he; "where did you wish to go?"

He had only just got the words out of his mouth when the girl executed a fleak movement and tripped him up as cleverly as a professional could have done. Setting her satchel she observed:

"When I've got any use for any of you tenderfeet I'll just call you. I'm down here on a little pleasure trip from Dakota, and I want the city of Chicago to understand right here that I don't need any help. The last thing I did before leaving my farm was to carry forty-five bags of potatoes on my shoulder to my nearest neighbor, a mile and a half away, and if I can't get around this here town with this little shopping-bag I'll go to the infirmary."

She was about to go on and her three auditors were slinking away when a fresh young man, a bold rusher, came up, and taking in the situation at a glance, said:

"Right this way, miss. Let me help you with your baggage."

She never got any further. The girl picked up her grip and dropped the young man as she had dropped the policeman. Then the others laughed, and as the young woman moved off she observed:

"If you duffers were up at Grand Forks do you know what we'd do with you? We'd organize a home for the aged and clap you in it the first thing. Come and see me when I'm laying."—Chicago Herald.

The term "grass widow" is simply a barbarism, or fungus, which has attached itself to the English language. "Grace widow" is the term applied to a woman who becomes a widow by "grace or favor," not of necessity, by death, and had its origin in the early days of European civilization, when divorces were granted, but seldom, and wholly by authority of church. When such decree was granted to a woman, the words "Viduata da gratia, or "widow by grace." In the language of the French it would read, "Veuve de grace." The English word, "grass," is an incorrect way of pronouncing the French "grace."—Lord Chester's Ready.

WHEREAS, default has been made in the payment of the money secured by a mortgage dated the nineteenth day of October, A. D. 1883, executed by Michael Hansen (a widower) of Kalamazoo, Michigan, to Samuel A. Clinton of Kalamazoo, Michigan, which said mortgage was recorded in the office of the register of deeds for the County of Charlevoix, on the 27th day of May, A. D. 1885, at 8 o'clock A. M., in liber "A" of mortgages, on page 243, on the 26th day of February, the amount now claimed to be due on said mortgage is the sum of Six Hundred Dollars and Sixty Cents, principal and interest, and no suit or proceeding at law has been instituted at law to recover the money secured by said mortgage, or any part thereof whereby the power of sale contained in said mortgage has become operative. Now, therefore, notice is hereby given, that by virtue of the power of sale contained in said mortgage, and the statute in such case provided, the said mortgage will be foreclosed by a sale of the premises described in said mortgage, to the highest bidder, at the South door of the Court House in Charlevoix, in said county of Charlevoix (that being the place where the Circuit Court for said County of Charlevoix is held) on the third day of April next, at ten o'clock in the forenoon of said day, of said premises as described in said mortgage, to wit: Lots Thirty-four (34) and Thirty-five (35) of Assessor's Plat of Carson and Hudson's addition to the village of Charlevoix, according to the recorded plat thereof.

Dated at Charlevoix, Michigan, this 4th day of January, A. D. 1886.

BIOGRAPHICAL.

Brief Sketches of the Public Services of the Chosen Ministers.

WE are indebted to the Chicago Daily News for the following brief sketches of the President and his advisers:

GROVER CLEVELAND, PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

Grover Cleveland is a native of New Jersey, born at Caldwell, Essex County, March 18, 1837. His father was a minister, and the President has living relatives prominent among the Presbyterian clergy, not to speak of his numerous cousins, who are doing good work in the ministry in various places. After preparatory instruction in various places, the paternal residence, Yonnor Cleveland was sent to the town of Clinton, Oneida County, N. Y., to finish his studies with a view of learning the work of the New York City law firm of his uncle. Upon the death of his father, young Cleveland set out for Buffalo, N. Y., to make his way in the world, with an enterprising young man, with Cleveland, who was then an entire stranger in Buffalo, he was induced to accompany his friend to the city of Buffalo, relatives in the city for years of age at the time, so assistant young Cleveland, who had a strong desire to become successful lawyer. His ambitious exhibited and was soon full the world, and at the same time enjoying the comforts of a home, young Cleveland, at the age of 23, was admitted to the bar in New York. His first political office was as Assistant District Attorney for the county of Erie, under Hon. Lyman K. Tremain. He held the position three years, until the end of his employer's term of office, when he was nominated for District Attorney on the Democratic ticket, but was defeated with the party ticket. He then resumed his law practice, but was soon appointed to fill a vacancy in the office of Sheriff of Erie County, and in November, 1881, was elected Mayor of Buffalo for a term of two years. His incumbency of this office was successful and popular. In the fall of 1882, he was nominated by the combined Democracy of New York, for governor, against Hon. Charles J. Folger, who was nominated by the Republicans, and was elected Nov. 4, receiving a 192,000 votes to 1,402,—by far Hamlin, 11,000 for Barlow, and 15,000 for St. John.

THOMAS A. HENDRICKS, VICE PRESIDENT.

Thomas A. Hendricks was born in Ohio on the 7th of September, 1819. He was graduated from Beach Hanover College, in that State, in 1841, and was admitted to Chillicothe, Ohio, to the practice of the law. Three years later he was elected to the Legislature, and was one of the ablest members in Indiana. His career opened auspiciously, and in a few years he became a lawyer of excellent standing. In 1851 he was elected to the State Legislature, and was a delegate to the State Constitutional Convention. The next year he was elected to the House of Representatives, and in 1855 his term expired. He was appointed Commissioner of the General Land Office by President Pierce, and from this office he has been one of the most important and prominent men in the Democratic party. In 1860 he was a candidate for Governor against Henry S. Lane, and was defeated. He was elected to the United States Senate in 1863 for the long term. After leaving the senate in 1869 he practiced law in Indianapolis until 1872. He was then made the candidate for Governor of the State, and was defeated by Governor Hoyt.

His name was presented to the Democratic National Convention in 1876 as candidate for the Presidency, and he would no doubt have received the nomination but for the Democratic rule, which, by persistently voting for Hendricks, Tilden, Bayard, Hancock, caused a stampede in his favor. In 1880 Mr. Hendricks was proposed as a candidate in the Democratic National Convention, and but for the unexpected fusion of that time he would probably have been the nominee of his party. He was nominated for Vice President in 1876, and was nominated for the same office in 1884.

He was married near Cincinnati on the 25th of September, 1845, to Miss Eliza C. Morris, by whom he has two living children. He was married to a lady 4 years of age. This was the only child, and its death greatly affected the father. He was nurtured in the Presbyterian faith, and was a member of that communion in Indianapolis. The foundation of St. Paul's (presbyterian) church in Indianapolis in the year 1867, when he became one of its first parish, and was elected Senior Warden.

THOS. F. BAYARD, OF DELAWARE, SECRETARY OF STATE.

Thomas F. Bayard is the hereditary Senator from Delaware, representing the fifth generation of his family to occupy a seat in the United States Senate. His father, the Hon. James A. Bayard, and his grandfather and father, the Hon. Richard H., was a member of that body from 1851 to 1869, and was elected to succeed Hon. John Bayard, was a member of the Senate from the secession of Delaware, in 1861, and Bayard were among the Democrats that did not follow their State into the secession of St. Bartholomew's day in 1861. They went first to Dubuque, and later to New York. Senator Thomas F. Bayard was born at Wilmington, Delaware, Oct. 29, 1828, and received his preliminary education at the Episcopal Academy of Philadelphia. In his early years, he studied the law in his father's office, and was admitted to the bar in 1851. He was appointed United States District Attorney for the State of Delaware in 1853, but resigned the following year. March 4, 1869, he succeeded his father in the Senate, and has been re-elected to place he now holds for a third election. He was a member of the electoral commission of 1876, and has often been a prominent figure in Democratic conventions. He has been the very idol and leader of his party in the Senate for a number of years, and at the last two National Democratic conventions his name was heavily considered as candidate against Mr. Cleveland. In detail considered in Senator Bayard's career as a lawyer has nothing in it of more than local importance, though he has long been recognized as one of the best lawyers in his State. He has made a record in the course of legislation, and has shown himself a ready speaker. His constant attendance on the duties of the Senate, his long service in that body, and his close attention to its business, have made him one of the best-informed Senators on the Democratic side of the chamber, and he is recognized as the leader of the group of public affairs. He is a great student, and has read much in his private hours, especially in the book of good literature, well balanced, and deliberate. Personally he is full, warm-hearted, and a high spirited gentleman of physical combined in the Senate, Senator Mr. Bayard's family is said to be Jacobite descent. Mr. Bayard's family is

L. Q. C. LAMAR, OF MISSISSIPPI, SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

L. Q. C. Lamar is a native of the State of Georgia. He comes of an old family which has distinguished itself in government affairs ever since the Revolutionary days. He was born in 1825, and graduated from Emory College, Oxford, Ga., in the class of 1845. He married in 1849, and soon after was elected adjunct professor of mathematics in the university of that place. At the same time he held the place of assistant editor of the Southern Quarterly Review. In 1852 he was elected to Congress from his native State, and served two terms. He then resigned his seat in Congress to accept the place of professor of mathematics in his alma mater, the University of Georgia in 1856, locating at Covington for the practice of the law. In 1857 he was a delegate to the Legislature of Georgia, and in 1861 from his Lafayette County, Miss., where he owned a plantation. He was elected to Congress in 1857, and re-elected in 1859. He resigned his seat in Congress to become a member of the secession convention of his State in 1861, and the same year offered himself as a member of the Confederate Congress, and was elected. He resigned that place next him to Lincoln on a diplomatic mission. At the close of the war in 1866, he came professor of political economy and social science in the University of Mississippi, and the following year professor of law in that institution. He was elected to Congress in 1872, and again in 1874, and was elected to the United States Senate in 1877, to which place he was re-elected in 1882, for the term ending March 3, 1887. He has been in public life ever since he left the University of Georgia, and has shown himself a ready speaker, a worker (for his party), quiet, reticent, and sound-thing of an idealist. During the Reconstruction period he was liberal and conscientious in his views, and threw his influence on the side of economic reform. He differed with his party on the question of the remarkable failure in its fine temper than in force. He is an eloquent speaker when aroused, and he is not a bad lawyer in Congressional of late. He made a national reputation in his speech on the occasion of the death of the Senator Sumner. He is a courtly gentleman, of high, possesses a full, rich voice, and has an attractive manner.

A. H. GARLAND, OF ARKANSAS, ATTORNEY GENERAL.

Augustus H. Garland was born in Tipton County, Tennessee, June 11, 1832. His father removed to the State of Arkansas the following year and settled in the bottom lands of the Red River Valley, of a suitable age young Garland was sent to Bardstown, Ky., to be educated in what was then the most famous seat of learning in the Southwest. His academic studies were pursued at Washington College, near the town of Lexington, during the latter part of his academic in Bardstown he read law, and attended the Hall of Causes in the courtroom whenever he had the opportunity. At that time the local bar was very strong. Garland profited greatly by this practice as well as by his studies, which he pursued with persistent devotion. Returning home he continued to use that zealous application which has ever distinguished him in a Washington, Ark. In 1860 he moved to Little Rock, the capital of the State. He was admitted to practice as an attorney in the Supreme Court of the United States on Dec. 26, 1860, and from that time forward his reputation was a national one. He was a member of the Legislature in 1861, and was a member of the Confederate Congress. He was his case, which was not decided until March 2, 1865.

WILLIAM C. ENDICOTT, SECRETARY OF WAR.

William C. Endicott is a native of Salem, Mass., which he still calls his home, and is now about 70 years old. He was graduated from Harvard College in 1847, and entered upon the practice of law in 1851. Washburn appointed him to a place on the Supreme Judicial Bench of Massachusetts, which position he resigned in 1861 on account of his health, and was Judge Advocate under Governor Andrew during the war. From that time forward he was a leader of the Democrats in Massachusetts, and was a member of the Legislature in 1873, and was the Democratic candidate for Governor in 1875 and 1876. As a lawyer he is said to be dignified, painstaking, and dignified. He is considered one of the leaders of the Massachusetts bar, and is a popular teacher. He is a descendant of John Endicott, who was the first Governor of Massachusetts Bay Colony. His mother was a daughter of the Hon. Jacob Crowninshield, who served as a member of Congress, and was President Jefferson's Secretary of the Navy. William C. Endicott was born in Salem, Mass., in 1826. He graduated at Yale College in 1847, and at the Harvard Law School in 1851, at once began the practice of law in New York City, and was a member of the firm of Dwight, Sherman & Endicott. He was a member of New York City in 1861 and 1862, and was a member of the Legislature in 1873, and was a member of the Democratic party. He was a member of the Legislature in 1873, and was a member of the Democratic party. He was a member of the Legislature in 1873, and was a member of the Democratic party. He

What Shall the Church do About Intemperance?

Shall it do nothing? Shall it be silent on a subject like this? Shall the pulpit confine itself to the discussion of abstract questions of theology, or metaphysics, or disputations on science? Will any one demand that no word be spoken against such a destroyer as the liquor system?

The church of Jesus Christ is the friend of humanity. It must, therefore, be the enemy of man's enemies.

Has mankind a more terrible enemy than alcohol? It unquestionably destroys from eighty to one hundred thousand lives annually in this country alone. It sends souls to hell in numbers too great to be estimated without sickness of heart. Doesn't Christ want this work stopped? If His church feels no interest, who will come to the rescue? Infidels? The non-religious?

There is no such bold, defiant, successful enemy to the church as strong drink. The saloons and bars have more patrons among the young than the Sunday school and church. Here is one cause of small congregations in cities. The young who have become frequenters of such places conceive feelings of strong dislike for the church. Those who breathe a beer laden atmosphere through the week cannot endure the atmosphere of God's house on Sunday. The conversation of the drum shop creates a distaste for sermons, and Bacchinal songs are rivals to Zion's hymns. The drink habit makes men poor, and robs the treasury of the house of God.

The church of Christ is His army of occupation. Must it still, surrounded by such enemies, witness the progress of measures which threaten its destruction, and which, if not arrested, will surely destroy it, and refuse to strike it? Is it cowardice, or treason, or imbecility that demands the adoption of such a plan, and rebukes the faintest demonstration of vigilance on the part of the church?

Unless the church trains its members as soldiers to fight against evil, and destroy the works of the devil, it will become a by-word among men.

The boldest evils must receive the hardest blows. The greatest resistance the more determined must the attack be. That is a strange thing, of which we hear so much—"You can't put it down, and it is folly to try." We must try. If we do not put down the rum system it will put the church down. It is pressing forward to greater conquests. Our antagonism alone will prevent it from ruling the whole world. And it rule would be ruin.

Every preacher and every man and woman in Christ's church should be on this side. No political affiliations should divide good men into parties, when moral issues are at stake. Let all this unite, and announce it by significant acts, and, when possible, by votes, and a new day will dawn, in which rum will be rebuked.—[Washington Square Herald, Trenton, N.J.

EMBEZZLEMENT.

The People vs. John Connor—A Crooked Transaction.

Through all the business career of Mr. John Connor in Charlevoix there has been more or less of trouble and tribulation, and since the fire last fall he seems to have had more than his usual amount.

The stock of boots and shoes then partially destroyed was covered by a chattel mortgage in favor of W. D. Robinson & Co., of Detroit, who took possession of that portion saved, by Cruickshank & Grier, their attorneys, to secure themselves. Afterward, Mr. Connor was again permitted to have possession of the stock, to sell for them on certain conditions. The conditions were not fulfilled, and again the stock came into the hands of the attorneys of Robinson & Co. This firm then sent an agent here to adjust matters, and he found the stock 400 pairs short of the sheriff's inventory. A search warrant found some fine shoes sewed up in a bed tick in Connor's house. Further search brought forth large portions of the missing stock from Mrs. Connor's farm and elsewhere.

On Friday Connor was arrested, but released on bail to appear for examination on Tuesday. The prosecuting attorney being unavoidably detained away, the case was adjourned to Wednesday, and the examination is in progress to day. There have been found in his possession, secreted in various places, 167 pairs of boots and shoes, and 53 pairs of stockings.

On Sunday Kerr Budd became involved, having in his possession a trunk with instructions to take it into the county "for a woman." Failing to reach the place, he returned, leaving the trunk in the livery barn for further orders. The transaction being suspicious, the sheriff caused the arrest of Budd and the trunk to be opened, and it was found to contain 51 pairs of fine ladies' shoes. Budd claims he was employed to do the work, and knew of no crookedness, but he was held with bail for examination, to follow after Connor's examination.

At one time the discoveries caused much excitement, and promised to put in an unenviable position several prominent citizens. And the end is not yet reached.

The defense is conducted by F. W. Mayne, with J. Milo Eaton as counsel.

Fighting With Bashi-Bazouks.

I find that I am the first correspondent who has reached as far as Debkah, and this I have done in a wooden dhow (Bongola is a little lateen-rigged open boat. The village was destroyed long ago by the Mudir, and there is now nothing but the fort built, as all these forts are, on the very worst plan a fort can be, that of a square. Maj. Kitchener has, however, improved on its construction by running out bastions to enfilade the ditch. He had gone to Aroko the day I arrived, and the only English there were a sergeant and two corporals in charge of the telegraph. "Every day is pretty nearly the same here, I," they said, "and at night we are terribly bitten by sand-flies," and a terrible plague the sand-flies, as they are called, are. They are nearly unless scapeical. I have never seen one, but they get into your bed through mosquito curtains and under the sheets and totally prevent your sleeping.

For the little garrison of Bashi-Bazouks I have great respect. Time after time it has been attacked, and has successfully defeated the attackers. The last time the Arabs had recourse to strategy. They built their fantasas very vigorously half a mile off; meantime they crept silently into the ditch underneath the low bastion where was the one gun of the fort. One of them, however, let off a rifle by accident, and the garrison were at once alarmed. Though it was dark they could perceive thousands in the ditch, and they opened a withering fire upon them. The enemy, however, succeeded in actually setting the wheels of the gun, and also the legs of the Turkish commandant, who was standing by, and a pull-devil-pull-baker took place. At length the officer was dragged within the ramparts. Hundreds of Arabs were mowed down in their desperate attempt to enter. In some places they threw skins over the zariba, and thus walked over the prickly abattis. At others, where there was no ditch, but merely mimosa against the wall, they mounted on each other's shoulders. At one time they actually succeeded in bursting open a wicket near the gate, but all who entered were caught in a rat-trap—they found themselves in an open court from which there was no exit, and they were mowed down mercilessly. For two hours did the assault continue. At length the Arabs, having lost the greater part of their number, retired.

In these desperate assaults by these Arabs one is reminded of the heroism of their ancestors, the Saracens. The different points where the ladders made their attacks were shown me. The ground was still strewn with belts, torn garments, and sandals. The bodies were flung into the Nile. "We are tired of fighting," said the old commandant to me. "I wish you English would come and do some of it for us." It must indeed be a watchdog life, as I used to find it when I was the only Englishman at Rosa Fort, just before Gen. Hicks' advance from Khartoum.—London News.

East Jordan, How do You Like It?

The last Boyne Statesman says: "We have every reason to expect that subsequent to the removal of the county seat to East Jordan it will come to Boyne City, and at the latter place county buildings will be erected. It is not expected that they will be built at East Jordan." We doubt if the people of East Jordan are working with any such idea. They are working for it for themselves; not for Boyne. We have some doubts about the ability of Boyne and the east end to remove again to suit their own pleasure, against the wishes of East Jordan. East Jordan will not permit such action to be contradicted now, before election, but she will fight for herself afterward,—all except perhaps one or two men. We are confidentially informed that at least one aspirant for a seat on the board of supervisors is very active for removal to East Jordan, and if he gets his seat will be the Judas to give the required two-thirds to submit again for removal from East Jordan to Boyne. The sentence above quoted from the Statesman gives foundation to the rumor. If East Jordan is working for herself, she will know the real sentiments of the gentleman who represents her on the next board of supervisors.

Candy.

A New York reporter makes the following revelations concerning the manufacture of candy: Candies that are embossed, such as peppermints and gumdrops, or jellydrops, are poured into imprints made in cornstarch, which is easily dusted off. Nougat is made with white sugar, pure gum Arabic, the whites of eggs beaten, and chopped almonds, Pingoli nuts, or pistachio. Nougat has to be boiled a long time, and is constantly stirred by machinery. Some candies are made in a few hours, while it takes a week to make sugared or burned almonds. Marrons glaces require a certain manipulation and to be long submerged in sirups, kept at a certain temperature, to become thoroughly flavored. The vegetables used in coloring are a particularly juicy beet that supplies the reds and pinks, lettuce and spinach for greens, carrot for yellows; coffee and maple sugar are used for browns. The "Estelle" bonbon, made of apricot and marshmallow, is the last thing in soft or French candy; while "cents," or "opera favors," which are twisted sticks covered with acid fruits, and cut into small pieces, are the Christmas feature in hard confectionery. "Strings," which are bat snips of chocolate and cinnamon hard candy, are also new.

An Editor's Honest Confession.

"Good morning," greeted a travelling man, as he came into the editor's sanctum.

"How d'y,?" said the editor.

"Fine day," continued the t. m.

"Yes; what do you know?" pursued the editor, tilting back in his chair to receive the latest news.

"Oh, nothing; nothing at all,"

"That so?"

"Yes."

"Well, a man told me you didn't know anything, but I'll be darned if I thought you'd acknowledge it yourself."

The man scratched his head and wondered what right an editor had to catch him up on a little conventionality like that.—Merchant Traveler.

Of every twenty persons who, when a bill is presented, almost involuntarily exclaim: "Leave it, I'll settle it," at least eighteen know the bill is all right, and of the eighteen probably sixteen could pay the amount just as well one time as another. It is quite as often the rich who thus thoughtlessly make a man run twice or more for his money as people of moderate means. "I never made a man call twice for his due," remarked a gentleman a few days since, and he was 80 years of age. Imagine the amount of happiness this man has contributed to this world.

Political Paragraphs.

Secretary Whitney has a number of experts investigating naval accounts.

Inasmuch as there is not an upper peninsula man on either state ticket, the Marquette Mining Journal advises voters to "carefully abstain from putting stale tickets in the ballot box."

All the prominent corporation attorneys of Detroit have joined in an attempt to reelect Judge Cooley to the supreme bench, and have flooded the state with circulars asking the co-operations of attorneys. They will get mighty little assistance in this county.

The new government is retrenching in every possible manner, by cutting off useless clerks and appendages everywhere. Horses and carriages, drivers and stables maintained at public expense have been dispensed with, and a return to the simple economies is apparent in every department.

We understand that the Algonah is now already for her season's work, and as soon as sufficient rain comes to settle the snow on the ice, she will commence breaking a channel. It is said that the ice in the straits is thawed more now than it was this time last year.—[Cheboygan Democrat.

The supreme court is the safe guard of our liberties. Our legislature itself has not the power for good or evil that the supreme court has, for the court passes on the acts of the legislature, and when it gets so our supreme court is hired at a salary by railroads it is time a thorough overhauling should take place.—[Cheboygan Democrat.

The democrats and greenbackers have united upon a candidate, who is every way worthy of the public confidence. Mr. Morse is a lawyer of very good ability, a man of sound judgment and common sense and of popular sympathies, a gentleman of unquestioned integrity, and a gallant soldier with an empty sleeve.—[Evening News.

A republican who advertises only in his party paper, solicits custom only from republicans and evidently has no desire for custom from democrats. Our friends should bear that in mind and when they wish to purchase anything, look over the columns of the JOURNAL and then purchase of those who care enough about your trade to solicit it.

It has leaked out that an expert accountant from the third national bank in New York, has been engaged by secretary Manning, and has been assigned a large room in the treasury department, where he has been at work two days in an examination of certain treasury books. The knowledge of this fact talks much to the uneasiness in department circles.

How art the mighty fallen! Do you believe it; the great, grand and glorious republican party has "fired" with the prohibitionists, the party which was so mean last fall that no republican newspaper could say mean enough thing against it. Surely this is a "natural evolution" as bad as any the truly good republican have so long howled about.—[Independent.

Last year our friends the prohibitionists were very pronounced in their resolutionary denunciations of the extravagancies of corporations. What has come over them this year that they nominate a man for the supreme bench who out of thirty-one cases against corporations gives thirty of them to the soulless corporations? Are they satisfied with that record?—[Evening News.

Commenting on the republican nominees for supreme judges, the Grand Rapids Democrat says: "From the resolutions adopted by the convention it would appear that in the opinion of the delegates there was nothing in the state except Judge Cooley competent to sit on the supreme bench, and the wonder is that the convention did not recommend to the legislature that instead of increasing the number of supreme court judges to five they should reduce it to one, as there was really only the one man big enough to hold the position.

During the closing month of the old administration about 6,000 resignations of post offices were sent in, with some democrat recommended for a successor, but it is understood that the present administration does not look with favor on this species of political trading, and that none of these persons so recommended will be appointed where it is possible to find other competent men for the places. This is rather unfortunate for our friend Martin at Boyne, who, we understand, was recommended for the vacancy caused by the resignation of Mr. Bodour.

Martin V. Montgomery, of Lansing, has been appointed commissioner of patents. It has been broadly hinted, and with good reason, that he deserves a better place. Perhaps he will get it. President Cleveland is reported as well pleased with him, and in the order of events he will be promoted. In fact, on the death of Mr. Clark, assistant Secretary of the interior, Mr. Montgomery was at once suggested for the place. We personally know him to be a patient and persistent worker for democracy, and these honors are a just recognition of his abilities.

Strange Conglomeration.

A Lansing correspondent writes: A prominent gentleman from Washtenaw says Judge Cooley declined, after two hours of importunity, to sign a petition making the legislature to pass the bill now pending to prohibit the sale of liquor within five miles of the university at Ann Arbor. The report is founded upon the statement of the gentleman who asked Judge Cooley to sign the petition. A well known senator of the greenback party said in the capitol to day that Judge Cooley told him in private conversation that he is a greenbacker in sentiment, and held more advanced opinions than the supreme court of the United States on that doctrine. Those views will interest prohibitionists and friends of sound currency in the republican party.—[G. R. Democrat.

A gentleman and lady went to the skating rink the other evening. She intended to exhibit her graceful glide on wheels. He was no skater, merely a spectator. And this is what he saw: "A dash, a crash, 'twas awful rish, but the roller skates upset her. A slip, a rip, she cut her hip, but the next time she'll do better. A slide she tried, the skates were snide, they proved to be a flatter. No more she'll soar like rink all o'er, because her ma won't let her."

Stuart Charles and family recently removed to this place from Kaylloo, Tuscola county, Mich. They are much pleased with this country and contemplate making it their future home.

The spring term of school opens in April with Miss Nellie M. Hawkes officiating as teacher.

John Cumberlidge and family recently returned home from their visit to Lansing. While there John visited the capitol and was kindly greeted and entertained by Lieutenant Gov. Holmes, and Representative Hampton.

E. M. Clark, of Charlevoix, recently made a business and social trip to this town.

Mrs. Harry Arthur, of Denison, who died at her home March 6th, was for a few years a resident of this place. Her maiden name was Addie Crawford. She came in company with her parents to this township a few years ago. Upon organization of the Good Templars Lodge at this place, her name appears as one of the original members. A few years later, she left this village to live in Denison, and she has lived an exemplary Christian member and a christian to her death. Her sweet faith never failed her in those years, or her late sickness; but was shown and manifested by her exemplary christian character and fortitude. Her desire to live a christian life was very great. Her infant child died a few days previous. She was aware that she could not recover, and her request was to have her child buried at her side. She was born in St. Lawrence county. The funeral services were held at the Presbyterian church, at this place, at two o'clock p. m. Sunday. Sermon by Rev. Mr. Whitney, by her request. Text, the 4th verse of the 23d Psalm. She was about 24 years of age, and leaves a husband, aged parents, but brothers and one sister.

S. G. Simmons has revived his idea of going to the other side of the "Jordan" with his store building. He has already the runners placed under one of his buildings preparatory to removing.

Rev. Mr. Blake assisted by Rev. Mr. Whitman are holding a series of meetings in the East Jordan school house. On account of the extreme cold weather the attendance is not as large as it should be. Considerable good feeling is manifesting among the congregations.

A Mr. Meldie, of Banks township, has removed to this place, and is negotiating with contractors to erect a new shoe building in East Jordan building to be 20x35 feet, two stories.

Miss Anna Kent and Miss Mina Milner have returned home from their Bay Springs visit.

Mrs. Kimble Bagley, of Banks, is the guest of her brother A. J. Hawkes.

According to actual measurement their has been up to date about a foot of ice for a skating session.

F. H. Lutchar is making large additions to his stock of jewelry.

Dishonorable Warfare.

In spite of the fact that the Boyne Statesman regards any expression concerning the county seat indorsing on the part of anybody outside the limits of Charlevoix county a rank impertinence, we venture to say that the methods which are being adopted by some of the East Jordanites, will not commend themselves in good citizens. We have before us a letter from a Charlevoix county man who was in East Jordan last week, which states that 118 names were seen in that village that a number of hundreds of dollars have been raised and will be used to influence the election next month. The writer of said letter was informed by a young man and a resident of the county that he was offered four board and free quarters if he would remain until election and cast a vote for East Jordan. We are sad to all disposed to lend fault with the people of East Jordan for striving in all honorable ways to further the interest of their village; and there is nothing commendable in her offering herself as a candidate for county seat honors, by way of a compromise between the conflicting claims of the east and west ends of the county. But when the zeal of her citizens carries them to the length of bribery, and the colonization of voters to effect their object, it is full time to call a halt. Methods which would be branded as dishonorable in an ordinary political contest, are certainly no less dishonorable when employed in a contest for the county seat, and we have no doubt that all good citizens of Charlevoix, no matter what their preferences, will frown upon any efforts which may be made to defeat a fair expression of the people by any such means.—[Petoskey Record.

Books Received.

"Cottage Hearth" for April contains, besides the usual amount of short stories, poems, and domestic matter, an interesting paper on West Lawn Abbey and the Tower of London, by Miss Boyd Allen. The article is finely illustrated and gives, in the form of an easy narrative, a full description of the venerable buildings recently attacked by the "Dynamiters" in London. The publishers have increased the number of pages by the addition of a new department, devoted to correspondence about home gardening and general horticulture. This magazine is furnished with the JOURNAL one year for $2.25. See club list in another column.

"Proceedings of the second annual meeting of the Michigan State Pharmaceutical Association, held at Detroit, Sept. 9-11, 1885." This is a respectable looking volume of 238 pages exclusive of advertisements, and contains all the proceedings, discussions, and papers read at the second annual meeting. The book is handsomely printed, and will no doubt make a valuable addition to pharmaceutical literature.

Historical Society.

The society were nicely entertained by Mr. and Mrs. Blanchard on Tuesday evening last. The commodious parlors being well filled. The following is the program.

Music, violin duet, Messrs. Wheat and Carr. Paper, "Lord McGinsey," by John Nichols, which did both subject and self much credit.

Music, vocal, Miss Winnie Bartholomew.

After intermission, Wheat and Carr againkly entertained the society with a violin duet.

Song (reading by H. Lee Hudson). Music, guitar duet, by Miss Loveday and A. F. Washburn and was encored.

The lilting fields of Scotland, as rendered by O. J. Wheat and Mrs. E. W. Lane, violin and organ, was grand.

The program closed with a trio by Mrs. Kane, Miss Nichols and O. J. Wheat.

Once of the Society's pleasantest evenings was enjoyed by all. The regular order of business being completed the Society adjourned to meet in one week with Mr. and Mrs. Amos Fox, and a very interesting program is being prepared.

"The Fair" demands your attention this week.

Several valuable dogs have been poisoned lately.

Hettie Giddings returned to Charlevoix on Sunday.

George Darrance expects to go to Alabama this week.

What is the greatest curiosity in the world? A woman's.

Rumors of numerous new buildings so soon as spring begins.

Mr. Medad Thompson was eighty-five years old last Monday.

Ironton is to have a new saw mill, and a grist mill this summer.

S. Baker has closed his blacksmith shop, and moved on to his farm.

O. S. Washburn's baby girl died Monday night; and was buried Tuesday.

Wm. Horton, who has been confined to his house with neuralgia, is out again.

Mother Hubbard dresses and Sunday school pupils will soon be in style again.

Sunday afternoon was a little warm and a few "flyers" were on the street.

Mrs. Ruth Bedford returned on Monday from a three weeks visit in Petoskey.

The Charlevoix Iron Works company has been dissolved, E. B. Beauvais retiring.

W. P. Brown and wife will visit New York and other eastern cities in a few weeks.

Charlie and Louis See, and Montie Lewis returned home from Valparaiso last Sunday.

Jas. Inwood occupied the congregational pulpit last Sunday, during Mr. Van Auken's absence.

Map to syrup and buckwheat cakes are a happy combination. Bring on the syrup and we'll skirmish around after the buckwheat.

Boyne can depend on it, she will never get the county seat by first giving it to East Jordan.

Sap ran in protected places on Monday, although the snow is over two feet deep in the woods.

J. A. Hawkins returned home Saturday from Grand Rapids, where he has been at work this winter.

Last Friday morning the Beaver and Fox Islands looked to be only three or four miles distant.

Sims Baker has moved his tools to his farm, and will be prepared to do custom work for his friends.

One of the teachers of Antrim county walked six hundred and forty miles during a term or four months.

Leaving clothes on a line to dry over night affords no insurance that they will be there the next morning.

Deputy Marshall Cooper will sell the schooner Fleetwing for seaman's wages at 3 o'clock p. m., Saturday, April 4th.

"Smith's Dictagram of Parliamentary Rules" may be obtained of F. G. Hines & Co., as soon as a number ordered can arrive.

We hear that the schooner Barber has been tied up at Sutton's Bay for an old bill for wreckage, by a man named Hall.

Rev. C. F. Van Auken will preach at Rose school house in Hayes Friday evening, and at Ironton Sunday after noon at 2:30.

The board of registration of Charlevoix township will meet at the clerk's office on Saturday, April 4th, from 9 a. m. to 5 p. m.

It is said that the mail for Inwood has been carried by several times lately, the last time being entirely unnecessary, as the road was open and traveled.

Subject for discussion at the Congregational church next Sunday morning will be "Addition." Those just entering christian work especially invited.

Preaching next Sunday morning at M. E. church by the pastor. Subject: "God and Man Joined in Work." Union service at 7 o'clock. All are invited.

Do you want an economical admistration of your township offices? Then nominate and elect the men that will adopt and carry out such measures.

The county is undoubtedly able to build its own buildings, but are they ready? Buildings are now provided free, for a much less amount than the county can build.

Rev. C. F. Van Auken dedicated the new Congregational church at Bellaire last Sunday. A debt of $800 was provided for, and the church is clear of all incumbrance.

It is the current opinion in Charlevoix that the county seat will be removed hence, and when established, buildings will be erected, and everything done for permanence.

East Jordan talks with Boyne that the county seat will be passed around, but at home or in the southern tier of towns, when it goes to East Jordan it goes to stay. This is the manner of the men.

A weekly paper called "Inland Marine" has been started in Chicago, devoted, as its name indicates, to the marine interests of the great lakes. Published at 142 South Water street, Chicago, Illinois.

No business man can afford to write his business letters on a blank sheet of paper, or worse, one dishgraced by a rubber dash. It costs but little more to use first-class paper neatly printed and put up in tablets.

On Monday morning a daughter of S. B. Thatcher caught fire to her clothes, and in extinguishing it Mrs. Thatcher burned her hands very seriously. She will probably be laid up a week or more. The girl was not much injured.

On Monday morning Frank Hines' boy, aged two years, reached up to a table and took a bottle of carbolic acid, turning some of it into his right eye, down his cheek, and into his mouth, swallowing a little. Times were lively there for a few minutes, and the assistance of three physicians saved the boy's life, though they are yet unable to determine the extent of the injury to the eye.

Several young boys have been detected pilfering small articles from the counters of the Fair. Justice Mc Leod suspended judgment on prom ises never again to engage in the business; and their names are withheld from publication for the same cause.

The residence of G. M Johnson burned Monday afternoon, and with contents was a total loss. Mrs. Johnson was asleep, and Mr. Johnson was absent. The fire was discovered by some persons passing, whose prompt action probably saved her life.

James Martin has suffered all winter from a fractured ankle, received while attending the pier light into last fall. On Tuesday the bones were replaced and bandaged, and it is hoped that when the wound again heals he will be better able to walk than he has been.

The standard of dignity of the editorial profession is not raised any appreciable amount by the vigorous assaults of the Boyne Statesman upon the senior editor of the Charlevoix Sentinel. We believe, Phil, you damage your own cause more than you help it.

Charlevoix has a building that cost $7,000. Will the county stop at that amount? Will they not raise three or four times that amount, and get no better accommodations. Grand Traverse has expended $20,000 for jail alone. This county will not stop with a small amount.

The sentiment of the leading citizens of Charlevoix is that when the county seat is established at East Jordan, county buildings will be erected at once, and that it will never be removed. Charlevoix will vote to keep it at East Jordan, and the county will pay for the necessary buildings.

The propeller Michigan, which has been in the ice off Grand Haven nearly all winter, was crushed and sunk on Monday. The captain, mate, engineer and ten seamen left the boat but fifteen minutes before she went down, and with the help of a life boat reached the tug Arctic four miles distant.

A Harbor Springs dispatch to the Detroit Free Press says that C. W. Caskey and J. M. Burbeck have purchased the propeller A. C. Van Raalte owned by Smith Bros. at Cheboygan and rated B 1. She will be refitted and placed on the route between Harbor Springs and Mauistique and will carry the Beaver Island mail.

Charlevoix cannot have any fear of losing her prestige as the metropolis of the county, in the light of experience. Elk Rapids lost nothing by the removal of the county seat to Bellaire, and Charlevoix will lose nothing by removal. But Charlevoix will hold the county seat as long as she can, and so would any other town.

We desire to suggest to our friends in the townships that they hold their caucuses several days in advance of election, thus giving them ample time to get their tickets and slips without compelling the printers to work nights and Sundays. Tickets and slips correctly printed at this office, on the shortest possible notice and at the usual rates.

E. S. Hawkes is finishing this week a fine book case for the county treasurer, similar in workmanship and style to the judge's desk in the court room. Mr. Hawkes has also made a table for the council room. All this work is of ash trimmed with walnut in rich designs, and will be not only ornamental to the rooms occupied, but creditable to the builder.

A party of young folks disturbed the prayer meeting at the Ironton church last Sunday evening, and the next day complaint was made before Justice Sheldon, and each were fined five dollars and costs. They will doubtless be more moderate in their conduct hereafter. A repetition of the offense may cause names to appear in print.

Mr. A. W. Marks came up on Friday night with 12,000 trout fry for planting in this vicinity. There will be more to follow soon. Mr. Marks proposes to transform the basement of the Petoskey white-fish hatchery into a hatchery for salmon trout, using for that purpose the overflow from the white-fish jars. The experiments made at Paris in improving the breed of brook trout has been very satisfactory. Mr. Marks now has a cross between the brook and salmon trout which, retaining all the distinctive features of brook trout, is a much heavier and stockier fish. This cross (½ brook and ½ salmon trout) produces a fish from ½ to 1 heavier at the same age than thorough breed speckled trout of our northern brooks. Mr. Marks contemplates stocking Crooked lake this season with well-eyed pike.—[Petoskey Record.

Captain Robinson, of the steamer Cummings, was here Saturday last, looking up a route for that steamer. Her route will be from Old Mission to Elk Rapids, Torch Lake, Northport, Sutton's Bay and Traverse City. We learn that she is a very fine steamer and makes her 12 and 13 miles an hour. She undoubtedly will make a fine boat for the trade and has speed enough to make the trips, and will be here upon the opening of navigation. A liberal patronage will be given her we'll warrant.—[Elk Rapids Progress.

Brown & Co., bankers have purchased the corner lot of E. H. Green, where his law office now stands, and will erect early this spring a two-story brick block for a bank and residence. E. H. Green contemplates the erection of a brick block adjoining, but has not yet decided upon plans. This is the beginning of a building boom which will make times lively in Charlevoix this summer. It is also the beginning of a boom to build up Bridge street with something substantial and permanent, and we are assured others will follow in the near future.

C. W. Caskey, of Harbor Springs, is negotiating with Charles R. Smith for the purchase of the propeller A. C. VanRaalte, and if he should purchase the boat, proposes to run her between Harbor Springs and Mauistique, touching at Cross Village and Beaver Island. Smith made him an offer and Mr. Caskey is to be in town today to examine the boat, and if she is satisfactory the sale will be made at Mr. Smith's figures. The Van Raalte is rated B 1, by the underwriter's inspector and no better seagoing craft the lakes.—[Cheboygan Tribune.

OUR DEAD.

BY R. S. KELLER.

Too soon, too soon life's blooms fade and die;
Too soon the sweet joy from its cup is drained;
Too soon flights from glooms of earth's night,
We hide an glory into from longing sight.

Too soon, too soon the secrets of love do sleep
In tomb-like silence, and in all new keep
The eight-fold gates, whose bolts away
Could not outlive the passage of a day.

Too soon, too soon the length of love on life
Will lower, where tender words were want to Memory alone crowns fancy as she flies,
And lifting the blind sees back from paradise.

And more all, showering tears past,
Hath power not to lift one sweet smile,
Life - even out of silence that are shed
Upon a grave in which colors of our dead.

Margie's Locket.

BY JENNIE S. JPNSON.

"Stop a minute, fairy," cried Dick Laugton, as Margie's tiny feet danced lay. "Can't you stay long enough to see the birthday present I have brought?"

"A birthday present! Oh! Doctor Dick, do let me see it quick."

"Why, my present? Do birthdays bring inspiration?"

"Oh! never mind the poetry now, show me the present, please?"

"Did I say a present?" asked the young man, provokingly. "I fear I have made a mistake in the mode of expression. I should have said, 'Margie, say fair young friend, I have an article here for which you may desire to make me some exchange,' and then have awaited in silence your reply. Dear Margie, I am waiting it now."

"How provoking you are," said the young girl, with a bewitching pout, "to delude me into thinking you intended to present a gift, when really you only wanted to swap things."

"What do you say to kisses for an exchange?" whispered Dick, slipping an arm about her willow waist. "They are easily obtained, you know."

"Are they?" asked the mocking little witch, as she darted away. "Where do you propose getting them with so little trouble?"

"Very well," Dick calmly replied, replacing a jewel-case in his pocket and complacently surveying himself in the mirror opposite, "each one keeps his own, and I dare say mine is the best after all."

"Will one kiss do, Doctor Dick? Just one?" asked Margie, drawing slowly toward him.

"Behold to what a skeleton her treatment has reduced me!" exclaimed Dick, sadly casting his image in the glass, "and yet, to me a victim for years to her caprices, a patient martyr beneath all her frolic, she denies a few cheap kisses."

"Will then, how many do you ask?"

"Just as many as you have years to day, and that is fourteen, is it not? I'll take them in installments; three a day until we part, and only one right now. Will that suit your majesty?"

Margie took one glance at the attractive jewel case, and concluded that the proposition was a fair one; then, with a laughing grace, raised rosy lips for the kiss.

One seal of the contract given, Dick, true to his promise, opened the case and displayed a handsomely wrought chain and locket.

"Oh! oh!" cried Margie, "is that really, truly for me? And is there a picture in the locket of you, Doctor Dick?"

"Yes, I had one inserted," he answered, musingly, "for you to kiss and cry over when you go to boarding-school. Now, you are my little captive!" clasping the chain about her nearly neck, "and when I am far away in Germany, and you are at that dreadful boarding-school, you must let this slight bond sometimes remind you of your captor."

"Oh! Doctor Dick! dear Doctor Dick!" she cried, as she looked at her got, she threw her soft, white arms about his neck and nestled her golden head close to his warm young heart. "I cannot—cannot give you up. Why does Aunt Margaret let us go away, the only two she has to love her, her brother and her little ward? She will be so very lonely, and how unhappy we all will be apart.

"But, Margie," he answered, looking down sadly into the tearful, pleading eyes, "we must sacrifice our pleasure for the sake of an education; my profession is yet to be obtained, and your collegiate course to be gone through with. Only four years of separation, and then think of the happy meeting!"

"Four years" sighed Margie. "I shudder when I think of it. It is an age, an eternity. Oh! Doctor Dick, cannot some change be made?"

"Hush, little one; dry your tears and go to show 'auntie' your locket. Our hearts will be lonely enough at parting; let us not anticipate that sorrow now."

"Perhaps I'll have a new friend, when you come back," laughed Margie glad night, in answer to some saucy remark of Dick's.

"A house of your own," queried that young man, an unmistakable frown on his brow.

"Of course; isn't it often customary for young girls to marry when they leave school?" was the innocent rejoinder.

"Oh!" coolly, "now I understand. Shall I bring my little German wife to call?"

A startled glance showed Dick that his naughty question had hit its mark, and, with an exultant laugh, he caught Margie in his arms, saying:

"Promise me, little one, that no home but mine shall ever be yours, and I will promise you, by all that is true, that no other lassie shall ever hold your place in my heart."

And Margie gladly promised.

Four years and a half! and what changes had been wrought!

Dear Aunt Margaret had left her earthly home for one that was far more fair; "Doctor Dick" was far away over the treacherous sea, and Margie sat alone in her splendid room, gazing with mournful eyes out into the thickening dusk.

"Her thoughts were on the happy past, and sadly she conjured the love which surrounded her then to the half-courteous coldness bestowed by the distant relatives (whose home was here) upon her now.

"Doctor Dick has forgotten me quite," she thought; "his long silence gives sufficient proof of that. Alice and he another only care for my presence here on account of my wealth; Aunt Margaret is lost to me forever, and I am indeed alone. My heart cries out for affection, why should a mere childish promise detar me its warmth, its balm? I will no longer delay; Donald Drayton shall have his answer to night."

No sigh escaped here a more regal presence than Margie, as robed in shining satin, diamonds gemming her hair, and her lips, heart, she stood alone that evening in an alcove of the library, her hands pressed to her heart, while its glad refrain, "He is here, he is here," made music in her ears.

"I am sure I saw her enter this room," she heard her cousin Alice say, "as I shall want you to your fate. But make your solutions brief, Dr. Langton, as I shall call for you in a very short time."

Was it possible that this handsome, well-developed man advancing toward Margie could be the lovely, lovish "Doctor Dick" of four years agone? How could she longer doubt when both her hands were clasped in his, and he cried, "Margie, Margie, have I found you at last? is this indeed my little Margie?"

"Just so sure as this is Doctor Dick," was the joyous response, as she lifted sweet, welcoming eyes to his, all remembrance of the sad six months of silence blotted out.

"Do you know what a weary, cold search I have had for you?" he asked.

"Two hours ago I thought I had revealed to me your whereabouts. Why have you sent me no address?"

"You must be enigmas," Margie answered prettily, withdrawing her hands from his. "Why should I have thrust my address upon you when my last two letters have met with no response?"

"Letters!" he exclaimed. "I have took it in vain for letters from you. After the news of my sister's death I fell very, very ill, and as soon as able to travel, went to Norway, where I wrote time and again not only to you, but to your sister; I had all to no avail. A month ago I came to America and since then I have sought you every where. A few days since I chanced upon your name in the society notes of Dansby's paper, and straightway I came as fast as steam would bear me to see and talk with you once more. And now," eagerly, "tell me all about your self, and why this cruel silence has occurred."

"No time now for an interchange of confidences," laughed Alice, as with merry face she took Dr. Langton's arm; "for you are chosen leader of the germain, Dr. Langton, and Mr. Drayton is looking for Margie."

"A handsome pair" remarked Mr. Drayton, as, after a moment's gay jeering, Dr. Langton and Alice moved off, "for you to know you have heard, Miss Margie, the romantic story of their summer tour through Switzerland, and is happy result. It has been known for some time that Dr. Langton was Miss Alice's fiance, but I have never seen him until to-night."

Had a goblet of living water been held to Margie's lips only to be rudely dashed away? A moment before she would have swore that the words, "My little Margie," uttered so strangely, had sprung from a heart full of love for her absent lover, but now, oh heaven! the bitter pain she long had known was lurking in her heart again, and this cruel certainty was harder to bear than her former suspense.

Dr. Langton's eyes followed her from afar all evening, only to see he always surrounded by a group of admirers, and prominent among them the handsome figure of Donald Drayton.

Missing her once, he sought the conservatory, hoping to find her there, where those low fragments of a conversation were borne to him:

"Margie," said a voice he recognized as that of Donald Drayton, "I beg of you to listen to me once again. I can not bear to see the desolate look upon your face that twice tonight has rested there. Darling, you are lonely; can you not trust your happiness to my keeping? My love is

"Mr. Draxton," came a low voice a moment later, "you are my dear friend, the one whom most of all I trust; shall I—— And that was all, no farther clew was given to the answer on which his hope of happiness trembled.

A pallid face, he scarcely knew as his own, confronted him in a mirror as he turned to leave the room. And when Margie met him a half-hour later all the old childish brightness had died from his manner, leaving him a coldly elegant man of the world.

A thin veil of reserve grew up between the two after that, as slight and intangible as the cobweb which barred the enchanted princess from freedom, and as difficult to breathe through.

Margie grew paler as a week wore on, and a passion of pain often filled her lovely eyes as she saw Alice and Dr. Langton constantly together.

One day, at a gay May-day gathering, her temper broke beneath the strain so ruthlessly imposed upon it. A passing under some low-drooping branches her necklace was caught, and all her efforts to extricate it proved vain.

"Permit me to unfasten the chain for you, Miss Margie," said Donald Drayton, springing to the rescue.

"Do not hesitate to break the limbs, Mr. Draxton; the chain has been no lost a source of annoyance that I will gladly be freed some of its cruel fetters."

"Oh! that mysterious chain," laughed Alice, "locked and the key lost. Would not some absent lover be rejoiced to know that you were compelled to wear his picture night and day?"

"I fear I shall hurt you if I break the links," and Donald. "Is there no other way?"

"I have no such tender scruples, Mr. Drayton, provided Miss Stratton can only be relieved from what she so calls these 'hateful fetters,'" and Dr. Langton, as, with a white, set face, and a chilled "permit me" he wrenched the chain in two.

Margie turned swiftly away, and the glittering gold of the necklace shone on the grass as well as below.

"I shall appropriate it temporarily," said Dr. Langton, and, stooping hastily, he picked up the chain and attached it to his vest, with the jeering remark, "Some lady fair would not consider it immodest becoming?"

An hour later he had left the gay scene, and was strolled away in the woods. There he gave himself up to painful thought.

"Day after day," he communed with himself, "have I waited for some slight but positive clue to her secret to Drayton on that eventful night. Day after day I have borne tortures in silence, but this morning the climax was reached when the necklace once so cherished was unceremoniously left at my feet. And now Margie's lips and not her manner shall decide my fate for me."

But what sound was this breaking up in the stillness? He raised a startled glance, and there, as if in answer to his thoughts, he saw Margie advancing toward him.

She was quite oblivious to his presence, and walked with a slow and meditating air.

All pride had left her beautiful face, the lips had been heavy with unshed tears, the droop of the lovely lip, lent a child-like grace to her perfect features, and as Dr. Langton gazed he saw all traces of resentment left his heart.

"Margie," he quietly said, "not to be alarmed," noting her look of startled fear, "I had hoped to have an interview with you to-day; chance has sided me. May I speak with you now?"

"Yes, if you wish," she replied, "provided it be redeemed on the same terms. Give me one kiss, darling, and I will listen to you."

So Margie, as once before, raised tender lips to his and gave the kiss which not only won back her locket but bound her for life to "Doctor Dick."

TWO HUNDRED LIVES

Crushed or Asphyxiated in a German Colliery.

Less than Two Score of the 219 Diggers Arrested Dead.

[By cable from Berlin.]

At the mining district of Camphausen, near Saarbrueck, in Rhenish Prussia, a fearful explosion occurred early this morning. Just before daybreak the last of the day shift of men had gone down in the cages of the largest mines. Everything was reported in order, though signs of fire damp in two of the levels had somewhat disturbed the superintendent. Still, the ventilating apparatus working through the main shaft was in perfect order, and no catastrophe was feared. The men, in taking these safety-lamps, had been specially warned to be careful. After while the cars taken with coal began coming to the surface. The 219 men who had gone down were missed, and all was well. At 6:30 a terrible rumbling shook the earth. A flash of flame leaped up the shaft and a volume of rolling smoke poured out. This was followed by the crushing of timbers and the tumbling of earth down the shaft. From all quarters men and women came running to the mouth of the pit. There are fifteen thousand employed in the Camphausen coal field, and in a quarter of an hour a crowd of five thousand men and women assembled at the spot, the air shrieking and sobbing, were around the mouth of the pit. Only the heavy smoke rolled away as attempt was made to lower the cages, but they would not move. The force of the return brought at the pit's mouth bodies of the explosion had altered the ventilating engine. Still the ventilating engine was kept going, and yet finished. It was the good, we thought from a first glance that no fire had reached the pit. Unfortunately we were wrong. Volunteers were called for to descend. A temporary cable was rigged, and men were lowered down to save their fellows. On reaching the supposed drift they found a door rolling and sealed to stop. Thirty men were there in a state of terror and semi-stupefaction from the dense fumes still pervading the galleries. These men were brought to the surface alive.

The rescuers and the rescued were greeted with shouts of delight as they came in pairs to the surface. The thousands of women were on their knees praying. Then a difficulty now began. There were still 180 men in the mine whose chance of life was ebbing away at every minute. Doubtless many of them had been killed instantly by the blast of exploding gas, and others had been suffocated shortly after, before the crowd retreat to the main shaft. Some were found down again, but their progress soon was stopped. The death-like silence, broken only by groans, and faints, and shrieks, and cries, and sobs, was appalling. Men with the unfolded men were fearless, but they were pale, and they smelt fire, and they had to do things which men in ordinary cases, one way to reach the unfortunates, and the men who had been Liquor Adulteration.

At a Manhattan Temperance meeting in New York, Major C. B. Cotton, Vice President of the American Temperance Society, said:

"I manufactured liquor for twenty five years. I began the liquor business selling beer over my father's bar when I was fifteen years old. I know all about it and can make any kind. The adulteration of liquor is something of it will surprise you. A man stands you know little about and the extent about as good chance of being struck by lightning as to get a pure article of brandy in New York. With rectified whiskey as a basis we can imitate any kind of brandy. The French are more expert than we are; we begin where they leave off, and God pity the man who drinks the stuff we make. We make champagne which you buy for the genuine article. It costs, to manufacture it, four dollars a basket; we sell it for ten dollars to dealers. We make the stuff and put it in as genuine, import Spanish corks for the bottles and French straw and baskets to pack them in. We buy one barrel of it. Our cooper takes the pattern and makes ours by it. They are new and bright. We put them through a staining process and they come out old and rusty and worn, just like the genuine importation. Thirty-two deadly poisons are used in the manufacture of wine. Not one gallon in fifty sold here ever saw France. We send thousands of gallons of whisky to France to have them come back to us something else. Of all the poisonous liquors in the world Bourbon whiskey is the deadliest. Strychnine is only one of the poisons in it. A certain oil is used in its manufacture, eight drops of which will kill a cat in eight minutes, and a dog in nine minutes. The most temperate men in New York are the wholesale dealers. They dare not drink the stuff they sell."

The Liquor Traffic.

The Louisville Courier-Journal says of the liquor traffic:

It is a business which is opposed to every clergyman in the country.

It is a business which every merchant and business man hates and detests.

It is a business which is the standing dread of every mother.

It is a business which makes ninety per cent of the pauperism for which the tax-payer has to pay.

It is a business which makes ninety per cent of the business in the criminal courts.

It is a business which keeps employed an army of policemen in the cities.

It is a business which puts out the fire on the hearth, and condemns wives and children to hunger, cold and rags.

It is a business which fosters vice for profit and educates in wickedness for gain.

Drunkenness comprises all other vices. It is the dictionary of vice, for it includes every vice.

Drunkenness means peculation, theft, robbery, arson, forgery, murder; for it leads to all these crimes.

"No License" Reform.

A western journal has the following very practical remarks for those who cannot get along without frequent whiskies:

Liquor dealers pay on an average $2 per gallon for whiskey. One gallon contains an average of sixty-five drinks at ten cents a drink, and the poor man pays $6.50 per gallon for his whiskey. In other words, he says $2 for his whiskey and $4.50 to the man for handing it over the bar. Make your wife your tax-keeper. Lend your wife $2 to buy a gallon of whiskey for a beginning, and every time you want a drink go and pay ten cents for it. By the time you drink a gallon she will have $6.50, or enough to refund the $2 borrowed from you, to pay for another gallon of whiskey, and a balance of $2.50. She will be able to conduct future operations on her own capital, and when you become an inebriate, unable to support yourself, shunned and disposed by all respectable persons, your wife will have money enough to keep you until you get ready to fill a drunkard's grave.

The Chicago

Weekly News

AND THE

Charlevoix Journal

ONE YEAR

For $2.00

THE CHICAGO WEEKLY NEWS is now an eight page, sixty-four column paper. It is the largest "dollar weekly" in America. Its eight broad, long pages present each week a mass of closely selected matter, containing much to suit each of the varying tastes of the family circle. First and foremost it gives ALL THE NEWS, complete as to details, yet concise in form. In connection with the CHICAGO DAILY NEWS (member of the Associated Press) it gives it facilities for news gathering unsurpassed by any journal in the country. Its MARKET REPORTS are specially complete and thoroughly trustworthy. Particular attention is given to agricultural and home matter. Every issue contains SIX COMPLETED STORIES, and a regular installment of an original story by some well-known English or American author, exclusively secured for the CHICAGO DAILY NEWS. Condensed notes on fashions, art, industries, literature, science, etc., etc., appear regularly.

Few papers in the country are so extensively quoted by the press in general for its bright and humorous paragraphs as the Chicago Daily News. These are all reproduced in the WEEKLY NEWS. In its editorial expression the paper speaks from the standpoint of the independent journalist, thereby escaping the temptation to support or condone the questionable from under the pressure of party allegiance. Mere partisan extremists will not like it; to the fair minded and thoughtful of all parties will appreciate and value its candid statements of facts and conclusions, all calculated to qualify the reader for the formation of his own intelligent opinion. The political events of the year to come promise to stamp such a character that a thoroughly truthful and impartial record becomes all important rather than a partisan one, colored and perverted to individual liking.

In all its departments the CHICAGO WEEKLY NEWS aims to present an entertaining, impartial and interesting family newspaper, of the very highest grade.

WHAT OLD SUBSCRIBERS SAY

When they Renew their Subscriptions.

William Cannon, Pontiac, Oakland County, Mich., says: "I think it is the best paper in America."

W. W. Cook, Sullivan, Ill., says: "It is better than many of three times its price."

James C. Moore, 237 St. Charles street, New Orleans, La., says: "In commencing your paper I commend it to every home and family. The Chicago Daily News is a household word in this section. I take the Daily and Weekly News. It is the newspaper of the day. It is true to the interests of the people."

Alfred Foster, Wooster, Henry County, Ill., says: "It is one of the one-dollar papers yet."

W. W. Rhodes, Leroy, Mich., says: "I don't want to miss a number, for it is the best paper I get for a dollar."

Jacob Ruhlen, Peru, Otoe County, Neb., says: "I think it is the best paper for the money I receive. I have taken it for years, and would not do without it if it cost double the money we call it at home. Success to the Weekly News."

Albert Foster, Wooster, Henry County, Ill., says: "It is one of the one-dollar papers yet."

W. S. Rhodes, Leroy, Mich., says: "I don't want to miss a number, for it is the best paper I get for a dollar."

Jacob Ruhlen, Peru, Otoe County, Neb., says: "I think it is the best paper for the money I receive. I have taken it for years, and would not do without it if it cost double the money we call it at home. Success to the Weekly News."

W. H. Davenport, Pekin, N. Y., says: "It is the cheapest and best paper I take."

Geo. L. Schaub, Hanover, Pa., says: "I like your paper more than I do other papers I take, and I take three as well as the WEEKLY NEWS."

Mrs. M. Lee Stewart, Tex., says: "I am pleased with the News. For I get 104 papers a year from home, and your paper is the one I look for most and read first. Wish it money impossible to get it in Africa, I would send either way."

Its size and character considered, the CHICAGO WEEKLY NEWS is the cheapest weekly in America. ONE DOLLAR A YEAR, postage included. Our special Clubbing Terms bring it within the reach of all our subscribers. Specimen copies may be seen at this office.

The Captain, who was a genuine gentleman, one of the First Families of Virginia, and appreciated a joke as well as the next one, thought his visitor was joking, and said:

"Can you get you a Chinese junk, if that will suit you?"

"No, no, Commodore; I am in earnest, or rather, I should say, I want to get away for a week or a few days."

"What's the matter?" queried the old naval officer, who was now assured his visitor was in earnest.

"Well, I am annoyed to death by a woman who claims that I am her husband and that I have $1,000,000 in the Bank of California belonging to her." The visitor was Ralston, the cashier of the Bank of California, who so unfortunately ended his life a few years later.

The Snow Angel.

The sleigh bells danced That Winter night;
The Bells danced merry ring with glee;
The windows overflowed with light;
Joy rolled each hearth and Christmas tree,
But to one the bells and mirth were naught;
His soul with deeper joy was fraught.
He waited until the guests were gone;
He waited until the house was dreamy alone;
And the night wore on.

Alone he stands in the silent night;
He piles the snow in the village square;
With spade for sword, a statue white
Crown the crystal quarry rises fair.
So from the quarry, to guide his hand
But the image the poet's command.
The sky is draped with a silver veil;
The stars grow pale in the early dawn,
But the bell tolls on.

And lo! in the morn the people came
To see the wondrous vision there;
And they called it "The Angel," divining its name,
For it came in silence and treasure,
It seemed no mortal hand had wrought
The uplifted face of prayerful thought;
But its feature wasted beneath the sun;
Its form was gone ere the day was done,
And the bell dreamed on.

And his strange was this: In the years to be
I will carve an Angel in lasting stone;
In memory hard, beyond the sun,
I will fall in darkness, will dream alone;
My soul shall pray I will find a way
To bring to the light to the light of day.
There's a world where no earth star or sun
Which parted years in the sun was,
And the bell tolls on.

The years go by. He has wrought with might;
The angel gained renown by the hand of art;
Still kept the thought that Christmas night
And the dream of the boy sculptor's heart;
In the light of the sun that Winter's dead away
Is embodied at last in enduring stone.
Snow Angel in marble—his purpose won;
And the sun tells on.

STRANGE MASHES.

Men Who Have Been Annoyed by Women.

A GIRL'S QUEER DREAM.

Charles Crocker, when Superintendent of the Central Pacific Railroad, long before he became wealthy, used to be annoyed by a young girl living in Sacramento, who visited his office daily—their office then being in the city—looked in at him, smiled and walked out. At last it became so annoying he had one of his clerks ask her her errand.

"I dreamt three times he was to marry me, and in my dream I was told I was to visit him daily until he spoke, but he does not seem to speak!"

And he never did speak.

DE YOUNG AND HIS BLONDE.

Charles De Young, who was shot by young Kalloch in 1880, was singularly affected by the appearance of a blonde woman, especially if she wore glasses. He kept this fact from his family, and even his brother Michael, who was repeatedly wounded by young Adolph Spreckels was not aware of the fact at the time of the shooting of his brother.

Charles De Young, in 1871, was passed into Calhoun Exchange, and had turned into Calhoun street, when it was just dusk. A young woman, with blonde hair and glasses, stepped him.

"Are you superstitious?" she inquired, her eyes flashing and in excitement.

De Young, who was naturally a brave man, replied, although a little nervous at this interrogation:

"No, why?"

"Because there is a curse hanging to you for sending Halpin to an unknown grave, and I am going to follow you to the end of the earth."

Halpin was a forger who had committed suicide, and De Young had a strange presentiment after meeting this woman that a great evil was to befall him, and he never saw a blonde with glasses that he did not scrutinize her closely to see if she was his promised Nemesis.

A HUSBAND AND MILLIONAIRE.

In 1868, Capt. John C. Carter, United States Navy, was in charge of the Lighthouse Department of the Pacific Coast, and was sitting in his cozy office on Montgomery street, enjoying his morning pipe, when a gentleman entered in a hurry, confused and excited.

"Commodore! have you a cutter, a steam launch or a small-sized frigate, that I can get to the Sandwich Islands?" said the visitor, stupefying the old Southern gentleman and looking him in the eye.

The Captain, who was a genuine gentleman, one of the First Families of Virginia, and appreciated a joke as well as the next one, thought his visitor was joking, and said:

"Can I get you a Chinese junk, if that will suit you?"

"No, no, Commodore; I am in earnest, or rather, I should say, I want to get away for a week or a few days."

"What's the matter?" queried the old naval officer, who was now assured his visitor was in earnest.

"Well, I am annoyed to death by a woman who claims that I am her husband and that I have $1,000,000 in the Bank of California belonging to her."

The visitor was Ralston, the cashier of the Bank of California, who so unfortunately ended his life a few years later.

HE WRITE CHINESE POETRY.

A prominent author of Chinese poetry, of whom more jokes are told than of any other living writer, was annoyed for many months by a daughter of a Chinese tea merchant, on Kearney street, writing him Chinese poetry that would destroy the appetite of a cannibal. It is so unmeaning, and, as he had no ambition to assume the responsibility of a Mongolian wife, even if the idea was Celestial, he made up his mind to find out how she had become smitten with him and what was her intention. So he called upon Hing Lung, and asked him if he knew his daughter was indulging him poetry.

"Possibly holly good!"

"Yes, I am aware of that, but I mean what does Miss Lung write to me for?"

"Allo samee Melican girl; she hella glead girl!"

"Yes, my dear sir, but I cannot comprehend how I have interested her; I never met her."

"Allee samee Ah Sin, he washee you, she alee you washee. She glead girl; she glow to Sunday school."

He saw it was like trying to discover the wherefore of the Pillar of Salt, so he gave the matter up, only to ascertain that a Chinese laundryman had found a piece of poetry in his vest pocket, which he brought to Sunday school for her to decipher, and she playfully had attempted to imitate it, and sent her imitations to him, hoping he would reply. She was only 12 years of age.—Philadelphia Press.

How to Save the Forests.

The New York press and a large portion of the people of that State are making a vigorous fight for the preservation of the forests in the Adirondack Mountains. These woods cover many square miles in the northern part of the State, harboring a vast amount of choice game, the lakes and streams furnish the best of fishing, and tourists and hunters are numerous over the favorite routes and at the resorts in their interior recesses. In these forests, also, are the sources of the streams, which form the head waters of Mohawk river, Hudson river and Lake George. The trees are being rapidly slaughtered by lumbermen and woodchoppers, and careless hunters leave or scatter their camp-fires so that immense conflagrations are often caused, killing the timber and burning the vegetable hold which gives richness to the soil.

As the mountains and valleys are denuded of their forest growth, the sun and wind dry up the marshes and springs in which the streams had their sources and the lakes are drained of their contents. This loss of supply is causing a shrinkage of the rivers, and as the Mohawk furnishes the water for a long level of the Erie Canal, that thoroughfare is likely to suffer from the drouth, which the disappearance of the forests will create. The Hudson will also suffer, its upper waters becoming unnavigable, and its wharves, built to accommodate shipping at high water, falling into uselessness.

Most of these evils are nearly anticipatory, as they are in all sections of the country, where natural forests, which protect the sources of the water supply and temper the climate, are being rapidly destroyed for lumber. Even in a prairie State, like Illinois, many streams which were well known and of good size in pioneer times have dried away and disappeared, because the woods and marshes at their sources have been cleared up. Such timbered States as Michigan and Wisconsin are witnessing similar effects to a greater degree. Sentimentalists have regarded this destruction of the forests as something in the nature of a crime, and have invented a word "surbaiscide" to stigmatize it in accordance with the evils of which it is the cause. How it is to be prevented is a problem. The States can hardly enact forest laws similar to the game laws, and the general Government has no jurisdiction over land which has been sold to private or corporate owners. Public sentiment is insufficient to restrain the greed of lumbermen and those intent on getting rapidly rich. If the present number cut should be limited, the lumbermen would get more profit out of it, and the reserve forests would become far more valuable. But there seems to be no effective way, either by legal enactment or by agreements among owners of timbered land, to limit the lumbering enterprises by which the country is being left naked and deprived of its greatest value.—Chicago Journal.

Physical Perfection of Polynesians.

All writers agree that physically the Polynesians are among the finest backing races on the globe. Their average height is about three inches greater than that of Europeans, and their limbs are shapely and muscular. They are rather superior to the women, who, though attractive in childhood, incline to grow too stocky at maturity. Their complexion varies from an almost European fairness to a dark brown, with occasionally a yellow or olive tint. The head bears a heavy crop of hair, which is usually black, with a tendency to curl. The growth is usual on the face and other parts of the body, and is carefully plucked out. The nose is apt to be long and aquiline, but disfigured by a flatness at the extremity. The mouth is well shaped and displays teeth of a purely whiteness. The shape of the head differs little from that of Europeans. The wide range of physical variation which has been noticed among these islanders, which at first blush suggests mixture of race, is disputably to their relatively high development, which always tends to differentiate men, to the extent of their dissimilarity in the environing communities between its parts. Only on the border of Melanesia are we to think of intermixture of races.—American Antiquarian.

Hon "Staffy" Learned to Use the Weed.

As soon as the American boy is born and has been a few times flogged, and has played truant and lied to his mother, he thinks it is necessary to smoke or chew. It is the first superior evidence he has of that of getting sick over tobacco. I can well remember when my mother, I am not ashamed to confess it, sent me with a small tin can, such as was then my to our mammoth distillery, to bring some milk or cream home to flavor the coffee. An elder son of blunder had given me a few afternoons small piece of tobacco carefully hidd oil his plug. He recommended that tobacco as entirely innocuous, and the proper thing to begin upon. As I was skiing with the tin pail I nibbled at the tobacco. There was something in it intelligent and enticing, yet not wholly wholesome. By the time I got home with the milk such movements were going on in my head that my mother, presidential election and no battle I have ever seen matched with them.

I got down on a log—for they were making a new well in the yard—and put my head over the grass and strangled to lose my stomach. I have often met it since with excellent effect. Neither my mother cause out and sympathized with me; my brother, who was of hard or material, said I had been chewing tobacco. We made a majority against him of one, and I was decreed that I had a delicate nature, fine tastes, and was entirely above chewing tobacco. But I have never since had an encounter with tobacco in that form.

A little later on I tasted the cigar. The first cigar did not make me sick and that was my ruin. A large box of brick houses has since gone down my throat on account of the failure of the cigar to do its work. The second or third cigar plunged me into a condition of curious intoxication, where I was drunk not only in the whole upper story, but it appeared to me that I had the drunks of a hundred men all confused there. Nevertheless, such is the depravity of human nature, I persevered smoking, and occasionally do it now.

FIGHTING IN THE DESERT.

Gen. Grahm's Troops March Up Hasloen's Hills and Down Mad-Down Again.

Bakerly Retreat of the British After "Winning" a Stubborn Fight by a Scratch.

The British forces at Suakin started out on a reconnoissance March 26. On reaching the hills near Hasloen, the Arabs rushed from ambush and got within ten yards of the British line before the latter succeeded regular firing. Lieut. D'Comond and four men were killed, and Capt. Beck was speared through the shoulder. The cavalry took some prisoners, and the British retired.

Gen. Grahm's telegraphs as follows:

"We moved out of camp at 6:45 this morning, leaving the Sussex Regiment in guard. In reaching the first hill, at 7:30 o'clock, we found that the enemy had moved and occupied another hill a mile and a quarter distant. After a short halt the Sussex regiment and marines were ordered to clear the hill, the Indian contingent and Gordon's Horse supporting. This was done very effectively, the enemy being driven off by volley, and advancing south toward Tamai were charged by squadrons of Indian Horse in the bush. The enemy then retired toward the south. Many of the men passed the night in the bush, and the fall and made for a hill west of the Tamai road, where we found Hunter's Horse Artillery, while other parties moving from Suakin were also engaged in the bush in fifty ones.

"Major-Gen. Zoutes, with four inches and one half-inch mortars, occupied the hill, and the Indian contingent and Gordon's Horse, at retreated to this position and will return to our camp, leaving the Rest Sussex regiment, with two Krupp guns and four Gardner guns, and water tanks and signal apparatus, also remained in position.

"Our killed are two officers and two men of the British and Sussex regiment. The wounded are two officers and twenty-six men of the British and officers and ten men of the Indian contingent. The infantry advanced with great bravery. The number of the enemy is estimated at 4,000. Their loss is not known, but is heavy.

"The engagement lasted five hours. The Arabs carried off all of their dead and wounded."

A correspondent gives the following account of the fight: The Arabs displayed desperate bravery. The marines drove the Arabs from the hill, and forced them to retreat the plain. Then the Indian troops coming on the Arab position, had been outflanked, and an unexpected body of Arabs, rushing in to cutting behind their line. The Indians fled, leaving the Sussex men front and flank. During this retreat, one of the Indian troops, a sergeant, having shot the leader of the Arabs, the Arabs fled. Then the Indian troops rallied, and the Arabs

Democratic Nominations.

For Justice of the Supreme court,
ALLEN B. MORSE.

For Regents of the University,
CHARLES R. WHITMAN.
MOSES W. FIELD.

Notes and News.

The European war cloud grows darker.

Every soldier should vote for Allen B. Morse, the one-armed veteran, for justice of the supreme court.

Vote to get your supreme court out of the hands of the corporation lawyers and against T. M. Cooley.

Vote for a brilliant lawyer, a plucky soldier and one-armed veteran for supreme justice, vote for A. B. Morse.

Thos. M. Cooley tries to win democratic votes by saying he voted for Tilden and Cleveland for president. He will find it a dangerous game.

It is the opinion of leading attorneys that the supreme court should be enlarged so as to give more time for the consideration of cases and filing of opinions.

The fight in Michigan April 6, will be a fair and square fight between the people, on one hand and the corporations on the other—between Cooley and Morse. Be careful how you decide it.

Consistent republicans do not quite like the idea of voting for a man who claims to be a republican, and yet who voted for both Tilden and Cleveland for president. They prefer to vote for an honest man who is not ashamed to publicly advocate his political belief.

West Bay City has a democratic paper called the Times, the first number appearing March 21st. The paper is four pages, six columns to a page. M. A. Dowling, of Muscelona, whose voice and pen were identified with Cleveland and Fallass in this district, is the editor.

The Grand Rapids Daily Democrat is now pasted and cut at the head, making it as convenient as all first-class city papers. Under the new administration the Democrat is making vast strides toward the front as a state and general home newspaper. See prices in another column.

The Detroit Post already concedes that Judge Cooley's chances of re-election are from encouraging. Maj. A.B. Morse, besides being an able lawyer, is a popular man in all parts of the state and is developing strength in the unexpected quarters. He is known to be fearless and incorruptible and in all questions of interpretation of the law can be depended on to stand firm for the rights of the people.

The First Patent.

The first patent granted to an inventor in the United States is mentioned in a speech of Ex-Senator Wadleigh, of New Hampshire, in the Forty fifth Congress. The Senator said:

"An intelligent gentleman of my own state has referred me to an act of the general court of Massachusetts Bay passed in 1646, granting to one of his ancestors, Joseph Jenks, the exclusive right of making and selling his improved scythe for the term of fourteen years. That, I think, was the first patent granted to an inventor in America. The improvement referred to changed the short, thick, strait England scythe into the longer, thinner, curved implement with stiffened back now in use."

The Thibokets.

An Alaska letter to the San Francisco Chronicle says:

A Southern Alaska Indian looks like an Arizona cousin and has his vices, yet in other respects he is usually an inferior article. Cunning workman though he is, fashioning curious and well-carved household utensils out of native woods and bone, making nets and buckets and silver bracelets and rings for nose and fingers, still the people in dwellers distances him in manufacturing blankets, dying woods, carving stones and making silver ornaments, and is generally a hand-some, cleaner, braver and altogether more attractive man. An Apache, unused of Southern Indians—will fight and show spirit, but an Alaskan never. The far South native is a low-souled tramp, an idly, thieving, superstitious, heathen creature, treacherous and pitiful. He has no image (church carved from wood) he is selfish and proud; a bigamist; a sordid creature, afraid even of his wife, whom he always asks to trade for him and always leaves penniless and helpless. That is, the Thibokets were generally a mean class before they began to see the benefits of the white man's civilization. As a general thing it does not improve the moral standing of Indians to have white men come to live near them. They reap but few of the virtues of the newcomers, but are pretty sure to imitate in most of their vices. When Alaska was more for alaska than it is at present, the Indians did not get drunk whenever they could, which they do now; nor did they sell their wives and daughters to the highest bidder. But they lived other lives, such as putting innocent people to death, because they thought they had an evil spirit; burning a wife with her dead husband, that both might go to the happy hunting grounds together; and other such pleasantries; and while civilization has rendered them more depraved in some things, it has, on the other hand, brought work to them, and offered a glimpse, at least, of better modes of living, of which some have taken advantage.

There have been converts to Christianity made here and there, and a few have moved into comfortable quarters, and very many have learned to work hard and save a little money. Our histories the few advancements made with pleasure, and only regret that there has not been more progress. If Montezuma was right in calling that people happy whose annals are tiresome, Alaska Indians must have been supremely contented. During the years of their ownership of Alaska they have done actually nothing toward developing the natural resources of their possessions. Not only have they never built any towns, but they have neglected the timber, overlooked the mines, and refused to cultivate the garden districts. Whatever has been done up to the present time is due to the white man. Before his advent a native was content to paddle about the waters in his canoe, and to live upon the fish and game which hunger compelled him to catch. As an actuality, an Indian here is a hunted, oily, degraded and lazy being. As a possibility, he may be useful in developing under proper influence, the vast resources of the little-dreamed, but undeniably rich, territory which we own.

Value of Ranch Lands.

Hon. L. Bradford Prince says: "Ranch property improves in price; the choice pieces of land grow scarce. Nearly all the cattle men are either English or Scotch. The largest company in the country is the Prairie Cattle Company, which is entirely composed of Scotchmen. I know of no German, Irish or French that own any cattle lands. Of course there are some exceptions to this business. Good prairie land in New Mexico is now worth from $1 to $2 per acre. This is higher than ever before. The business is very profitable, the annual return being 40 per cent. This year has been prosperous, and the loss of stock has been trifling. In the northeastern part of New Mexico the land is nearly taken up. A great deal, however, remains, and can be secured in other parts of the Territory. In Texas a person can secure as much land as he desires, as Texas owns its own land, and has divided it into plats of 160 acres by the Government. The value, of course, depends upon water facilities. If one owns a spring, or a water front, he virtually controls all of the surrounding country. In Idaho, Montana and Wyoming, the ranches are smaller, because the land is owned by the Government, it is leased, but can not be bought. The land laws of this country are entirely inadequate, for the reason that 160 acres in the Territories are very often of no use at all, because of the lack of water supplies. The Government should lease more than 160 acres, or, at least, should lease in such a way as to insure to each settler a sufficient supply of water. About five years ago a commission was appointed to revise these laws. It presented a scheme, but nothing else has been done. Two months ago a meeting of cattle men was held in St. Louis, and a memorial was asked for. Strong influences are now at work, and I look for some change before long."—N. Y. Commercial Advertiser.

The "Virgin of the Napkin."

When painting the pictures for the Capuchins, Murillo dwelt in their convent nearly three years, it is said, without ever leaving it. He painted for these months twenty pictures, some of size figures, and several smaller works. Seventeen of these are now in the Museum of Seville, for the monks had the wisdom to send their pictures to Cadiz for safe-keeping before the "Pimpin," master-general of Napoleon," as Soult has been called, could reach them. When the French wars were ended, the pictures were returned to Seville. Then not speak of them separately, but will say that the Madonna called "La Virgen de la Servilleta," or the Virgin of the Napkin, now in the Museum, has this pretty story connected with it. The legend is that the cook of the convent grew very fond of Murillo during his long service to the artist, and when the time came for them to be separated, the cook begged the painter for a keepsake. The painter said he had no canvas left; the cook quickly gave him a napkin and asked him to use that; with his usual good nature, Murillo assented, and soon painted this picture, which is now one of the famous art treasures of the world. It is not large, and represents the Virgin with the Child destitute, as if to welcome any one who approaches it. It has a brilliant color, and no difference that it is not easy to turn away from it.—Clara Erskine Clement, in St. Nicholas for February.

Curious Old New Jersey.

The natives are not the only strange things in Cape May county, writes a Cape May City correspondent to the New York Sun. It has been a peculiar land ever since Capt. Mey first set foot on its point, long before New England was fairly started. At one time all the county was owned by a man named Cox, who got tired of his bargain and returned to England, leaving an agent at Perth Amboy to attend to his interests. Quakers had purchased a large part of the land and settled upon it. They wished to secure the rest to be held as common property for each community. One of the brothers named Spicer was deputed to go to Amboy and make the purchase. Spicer made the long trip and returned safely, but with the deed made out in his own name instead of in that of the communities. It was subsequently discovered that Spicer had got Cox's agent drunk, and had then induced him to sell the land to himself for a trifling consideration.

When Spicer died, he left much of the land that remained unsold in the states to his three townships. He also bequeathed to the people of the county, to be enjoyed in common forever, the "Shell and floating fish privilege"—that is, the right to fish and catch oysters and clams in the waters of the county. Although the state long since laid successful claim to the ownership of all these lands under tidewater, it has by successive acts of the legislature guaranteed to the people of the county for various terms of years the rights granted by the Spicer will.

A large part of the land in the county is now held under deeds from this Spicer, and even to this day many persons refuse to recognize the right of the state to tidewater running through their lands, and cannot understand how their titles under deeds dated long before the state was created can be set aside. The "Spicer heirs" still maintain a organization, and meet annually to regulate the affairs of that part of the estate the title to which is in them, although the use of it was willed away or has since been purchased.

In olden times Cape May, now become Cape May, was expected to be a great whale-fishing center. Whales then moved in large schools within sight of the beach. To encourage the fisheries, "wholesomen's rights" were granted to the crews of the boats. The chief of these was the privilege of being free of rental, plots of land along the beach upon which to build boat houses and other structures necessary to the business, in order that no time might be lost in getting the boats to sea when a school appeared. The whales were quickly driven to more remote waters, but the "wholesomen's rights" remained, and, as, for convenience, the plots were always allowed to pass from from father to son, the "rights" became, in course of a century, valuable property. Front, corner lots in a summer resort. The last of these were not extinguished until a few years ago, when it was necessary to search all over the country for the heirs of the old wholesomen crews and secure releases from them of the ancient "rights," before a good title could be given to purchasers of the land.

Pastimes English Servants.

Even the delicate satire of Du Maurier and the broader humor of Leech have failed to exorcate the follies of modern servants and the foolish and fanciful causes given by them for quitting their services of their employers. "To leave in order to get a change" is become between master and servant a regular, recognized reason. Yet no fault is laid against you and Lady G——," a housewife said to a friend of mine a short time ago, "but I want a change, and I don't like the scenery or air. Another friend of mine had a footman who left her "because," she said, "he could no longer stay, as he regretted to find that his employer did not keep the company he had been accustomed to." A scullerymaid that I know, engaged for me begged to leave, as she declined to take any orders from me, declaring that she could only take orders from the person who had engaged her. A foreman in the employment of one of my friends allowed a great quantity of his master's green-house glass to be broken during a storm "because," he said, "it was not his place to clear the windows, and that he wasn't engaged to tell the second man his business." A maid to whom I once offered a situation declined it on the ground that she had once lived in a duke's family, and could not possibly stick lower than a viscount's, or else, to use her own words, "she would lose all self-respect," while a housemaid left me because she declared she considered the men servants of the establishment too delicate to be set to work to keep company with.—Lady Gosbell, in Longman's Magazine.

THE WIDOW O'SHANE'S HINT.

Whisht, there! Mary Murphy, dea - thinkt see in-tend-ing-ly
Jest On-dhe ter tell-ed-ed Widder O'Shane:
Sho as lives in the auldt shtyle shoes, Dean ye know,
An' does the feline washin' for ould Bisther Shane.

Wid wiver a widdy see a chiltd ter track in,
Her kittens as always as nate as a pin;
An' her cap an' her apron is always just classy—
Och, a mighty fine gentil is the Widder O'Shane.

An' wind ye believe me, on Saturdhay night
We heard a sound shiff-ennin' over on thatt;
An' Mike, me ould man, he jist forbeyd in me,
"Look out ter the door an' see who it might be."

An' I looked, Mary Murphy, an' sure me if there
Wan of the Widder O'Shane's cats on the door-mat was Hitt-in the hanthell; yer seen him yerself, wh'a cute

An' he knocked on the door of the Widder O'Shane.

An' I sidepeered in Bitchel, "Now, what can it
That his wiveship is cattle on Widder O'Shane?"
Bint dhe curious Friday wid us, dean ye see,
So I knew that it wuss I oughtenly ha'd be.

"It must be she wore ivhen some proper fer girl,
Through the neighbors do say that she pays to the cost
Ten fake pace of the baby, Michael Brady," said I.

"And I'll pape through the keyhole, I will, if I die

The lovely cattes kiss me' wha' chardy I see
But the Widder O'Shane sittin' inenthe fire at the hearthed was there, Bisther Thomas
Malone,
A-sittin' over-side or the table alone.

An' he looked at the Widder O'Shane, an' he let Wan a pressidyer-deal that yer-eider he wo'.
For I'm not sure an' down by a fair woman's side
Since I sat down to her that I once called me bride

"An' is it yer poor now, Widder O'Shane?"
Yer a cruel-ty woman, leth I say an' mean,
An' you'ns leth as he lives in the warmth alone
Widder O'Shane an' wi' Thomas Malone?"

Then the Widder O'Shane put the tea-kettle down,
An' she says, "Bisther Thomas, yer name is a crown;
I take it yoiet gladly"—an' then sat ould man Bisthered, "Bitthy-Green is 1000, quick as yer can.

Bi-lieve, Mary Murphy, I'd off that floor,
An' can fetch up afterwards, wid a-ny-one Am I yet to see Michael, "Now, leth us sup?
Sho it leave ye ter pay, will that Widder O'Shane."

RIVALRY ON ROLLER SKATES.

BY SARA B. ROSE.

The Albion rink was crowded with young people. It was the night of the calico masquerade, and when the masquerade was over, the young folks were to have a race for the championship of Albion. Every known shape and costume which could be formed from calico was there represented. Pirates in black and red, Indians in green, dizzies in yellow and white, and some amazeens young fellow represented a barrel of sperm, his head protruding from one end of the barrel, with long calico streamers depending from it, and his feet gracefully rolling along beneath. The best two young lady skaters, one of whom was expected to win the race, were attired in pretty suits of pink calico, with long streamers of pink ribbon floating behind them.

They usually skated together, unless it was when Alf Whitman, the brother of the taller of the two, joined them, and, leaving his sister Estelle to skate by herself, acted the part of a devoted cavalier to pretty Orette Harrington.

As soon as supper was announced the masks were lifted, and when it was over the young men stood aside to watch the race between the young ladies. None of the girls expected to distance Orette or Estelle, but several of them laughingly stacked out to keep from company.

Orette did not care to skate her best, for she knew that Estelle had set her heart upon the championship, and she cared too little about it herself to wish to offend her friend, who was of a very jealous disposition.

She had not thought of other opposition; but as they toeed the first corner, Estelle a little in advance, Orette was astonished to see a tall, slender young lady, in a black velvet dress, trimmed with old-gold satin, a black velvet cap upon her curly head, from which depended a long, old-gold-colored plume, and with white kid glove upon her hands, which reached nearly to her elbows, shoot ahead of her them and proceed to execute a number of intricate maneuvers in front of Estelle, and, in spite of this extra turning and twisting, the stranger always managed to keep in front.

Orette knew that this would be a very displeasing to Estelle, and by a little effort she gained her side, only to see that provoking stranger waltzing like a whirlwind before them. She glanced at Estelle and saw that her eyes were snapping with anger, and her cheeks were flaming with rage.

Suddenly the wind-up put on an extra spurt, and in a moment she was half way around the rink ahead of her antagonists, and was apparently intending to pass them again shortly.

Orette and Estelle were now the only Albion girls upon the floor, the others leaving off in order to witness the exciting race.

Estelle Whitman was a good skater and was very sure upon her feet. She was very angry at the antics of the stranger, and nothing a group of empty chairs by the side of the rink, she glided to the side of the hall, and as if by accident, she stumbled over one of the chairs, sending it sprawling directly in the way of the girl in velvet.

Everyone expected to see the stranger waver or perhaps trip over the overturned chair. Not so; a flash of amazement passed over her face, she increased her speed, and with the utmost ease she jumped over the obstacle, she in a second more darted up to the judges' stand, the winner of the race.

After the excitement was over, Estelle informed Orette that the stranger's name was Flora Archer, that she said come from the village of Camden, near by, and Estelle added, with upturned nose: "She don't pay the least attention to any of the girls, but is all taken up with those half dozen Camden fellows, who, I do believe, brought her here."

Orette laughed a little and took off her skates, as the rest of the evening was to be devoted to dancing. She had promised the first dance to Alf Whitman, but when the act formed what was her astonishment to see him at the head of the dance with Miss Flora Archer.

"Tony," whispered Estelle, when it was finished, "see her lounging in the corners with the young men; and she jumps like a jumping jack when she balances. Did you notice her, Orette?"

"Hush!" warned Orette; "somebody will hear you!"

"Well, I declare! I think I would stand up for her, Orette Harrington, when she is trying her best to get Alf away from you!"

Orette blushed at this coarse speech, and was about to move away, when Mr. Whitman and Miss Archer confronted them.

"Ah, girls!" said he, "I wondered where you were hiding your diminished heads. I wanted to present you to the belle of the evening."

Miss Archer cast a laughing glance at Alf, and appeared very pleased at this broad compliment; but Estelle frowned, and said in a cutting tone:

"I do not see a big introduction to Miss Archer, Mr. Whitman, and I think you might be a little more careful yourself about your acquaintances."

"Ahem! my dear sister. So you are jealous are you? Do not mind them, Miss Archer; they are beneath your notice."

"I did not say I did not wish an introduction to Miss Archer," said Orette, quietly, although she was feeling much embarrassed.

"Thank you," said Miss Archer, bowing and leaving Mr. Whitman's arm. "Suppose we take some seats at the other side of the room."

Miss Archer assumed so much of the bearing of a peacher that Orette, without thinking, almost, that she was a lady, took her arm, and left the brother and sister together.

Miss Archer drew some chairs into a cozy little corner, and the two sat down. They chatted a few moments, and then Miss Archer said:

"It is a very impudent question that I am about to ask you; but I would like very much to know if yourself and Mr. Whitman are engaged?"

"Oh!" said Orette, smiling. "We are not engaged and never shall be."

"Ah!" lounged Miss Archer, shaking her head; "that is because you are angry at him now."

"I am not angry," replied Orette. "He could not anger me by absuring another lady."

"But if you loved him?" persisted the strange girl.

"I never loved him," said Orette, laughing. "You may have him if you want him."

"You have made me very happy," replied the other, a smile in the dark eyes, then she picked up Orette's white fan with the other young men of Camden, they had planned the joke which had resulted so disastrously for Alf.—Chicago Ledger.

CURIOUS FACTS.

A SOFTNER can run down a tree head first. The cat and the bear must get down tail first if left to themselves.

The standing armies of Europe aggregate 3,501,951 able-bodied men. The taxes for their support aggregate $495,915,033.

WHEN boring an artesian well on the Dancoran homestead, near Los Angeles, the workmen discovered a deposit of conch shells at a depth of 180 feet.

A NEW motor, driven by the explosion of small cartridges of gunccotton, has been produced in England, and is said to be applicable whenever small powers are required.

A PHILADELPHIAN went to a physician with what he feared was a hopeless case of heart disease, but was relieved on finding out that the cracking sound which he had heard at every deep breath was caused by a little policeman's patent suspenders.

Of 4,692,548 persons returned by the census of Germany in 1872 as engaged in agricultural work, 1,236,086, or nearly a million and a quarter, were females. The land of Hindemarck still adheres to the old fashion of harnessing women to the cart and the plow.

In 1820 two bills of an area of about 501 acres, of almost no agricultural value, on the property of Lord Cawdor, in Scotland, were planted with fir and other trees, and after successive plantings, the sale of which realized large profits, the remainder of the land was sold off for $16,000. The sum realized for the wood on this waste land during the fifty years is stated to be equal per acre to the return from the best arable land in the country.

It is not a pleasant fact to know, but yet it is a fact, according to Prof. R. A. Proctor, that this world is far more likely to quake and overthrow cities and towns as it has done at any time since man existed. The conditions within the globe which cause the disturbances are changing, but we know that there is practically no difference between what they were thousands of years ago and what they will be thousands of years hence. Nobody would have cause of surprise, therefore, if the earthquake of Lisbon, in 1755, should presently be repeated. Indeed, it seems possible that great disturbances have recently taken place, not on dry land, but on land that is under the ocean, and that the big wave at New Haven and the shock they again indicate the limits of their action.

ON THE TENTED FIELD.

England Makes a Call on Russia—The Czar's Troops Moving Forward.

[By cable from London.]

The atmosphere is quivering with rumors from Russia and from the Danube, that succeeds the other with rapidity, and there is a feeling of insecurity everywhere which is causing a nervous feeling in commercial circles that is alarming. At a meeting of the Cabinet this afternoon it was resolved to firmly demand of Russia that she commence forthwith the work of delivering the Danube Ports, in accordance with the long-demanding under which Sir Peter Lanyon and the British surveying party passed so many months in the Czarev's dominions. It has been definitely ascertained that the Porte has asked Prince Bismarck for his advice concerning the advisability of an alliance between Turkey and Russia against England. Lord Granville, Minister for Foreign Affairs, had special interviews today with both Mussurus Pashas, the Turkish Minister, and Tahsin Pasha, the special envoy of the Turkish Government to England.

The East of Londonderry, British Secretary of State for India, in the House of Commons this evening, in answer to a question, stated that he had, on behalf of the Government, received a deputation that the Government had decided to annex Burmah to the Queen's Indian Empire. He added that her Majesty's Indian affairs at present rendered it imperative for the Government to exercise great prudence in engaging in any enterprise beyond the frontiers of India. Earl Dufferin, the present Indian Viceroy, has been instructed to endeavor to improve the British relations with the Burmese.

There is intensified by the suspicion that a secret treaty between the Porte and the Czar has already been signed. It was stated that the Turkish representatives made exorbitant demands, but that Earl Granville felt constrained to accompany acquiescence. And so well-informed people had long led to hope that Sir Ian Lamlis, of Inst, Turkey had been thrown away from Russia. Although the latter remove events excitement and indignation, they occasion little surprise. The treachery of the Sultan was not unexpected. He has long desired to divert the attention of his subjects from the numerous calamities of his reign, and he could be successfully accomplished by a foreign war.

War appears to be inevitable. The assurance of the Ministers that peace will prevail, is not considered of much importance. Indeed, their predecessors have given huge orders for supplies and munitions of war, from which those that preparations are being made. Some of the Indian Cavalry and Artillery regiments have received orders to be ready for service, and the Indian Government has ordered to immediately report their respective resources.

Dispatches received at Vienna state that the Russian troops are moving in force from the Caucasus district to the Afghan frontier.

The Boston Herald prints the following private cable dispatch, received from a reliable source: "There is great excitement in London. It is reported that Russia mobilize been called out. It is believed that Russia has rejected English proposals.

TURKEY FOR SUNSET COX.

The New York Congressman Appointed Minister to Constantinople.

[Washington special.]

Considerable surprise was expressed today when it was learned that Representative S. S. Cox, of New York, had been nominated by the President to the Minister to Turkey. It was known to the friends of Mr. Cox that he was anxious for a foreign diplomatic appointment, and it was generally supposed that he would be given the Minister to Spain, or Minister to Germany, or perhaps

What the Beer Business Is.

The brewers and distillers and their lieutenants, the saloonkeepers, stand in opposition to every class that makes any pretension to goodness or even decency. Their business is opposed to everything in the way of good morals or good order.

It is the one business that has demoralization as its basis, which lives and thrives only upon vice. It kills out of a man every good impulse before that man is valuable to it, and the customer becomes valuable exactly in proportion as he becomes bad.

It is a business which is opposed by every true clergyman in the country.

It is a business which the merchant and business man hates and detests.

It is a business which is the standing dread of every mother.

It is a business which is the constant fear of every father.

It is a business which is the horror of every wife.

It is a business which makes ninety per cent of the business of the criminal courts.

It is a business which makes ninety per cent of the pauperism, for which the tax-payer has to pay.

It is a business which puts out the fire on the hearth and condemns wives and children to hunger, cold and rags.

It is the business which fosters vice for profit and educates wickedness for gain.

Drunkenness comprises all other vices. It is the dictionary of vice, for it includes every vice. Drunkenness means peculation, theft, robbery, arson, forgery, murder—for it leads to all these crimes.

It is a business which is at the bottom of all the political corruption of the country, the tool that has always been used by unscrupulous politicians from Boss Tweed to the very last bargainer in politics.

It is the business that is used for everything that is bad and demoralizing, and which has never been associated in any way with any good object or cause.

It is the business which is the drag upon progress, the enemy of civilization, and the bar to improvement.

It is the business that is the right hand of the gambler, the pugilist, the prostitute, the thief and the vagrant.

It is the business that originated that peripatetic nuisance, the tramp, and is the father and mother of everything in the way of vagrancy and small crime.

It is the business that is answerable for a vast majority of the penitations and embezzlements and frauds by men in positions of trust.

It is the business that sweeps down every year thousands of young men, transforming them from the decent to the disreputable.

It is the one business in favor of which the only thing that can be said is that inasmuch as a man owns himself he has the right to commit suicide, moral, mental and physical.

It is a business based upon the lowest instincts of human nature, and the only one of which no one has ever spoken except apologetically.

It is a business which no one dares assert does no harm, the only dispute about which is as to the amount of harm it accomplishes.

And this business, this Pandora's box, insists the law shall not touch it. This aggregation of crime insists that it shall go on unchecked, unrestrained and unregulated. And more than that, it insists on make the laws and insolently asserts to control the lawmaking power.

Based upon vast capital and with an army of votes by the agency of appetite, it has taken possession of states, as it long has of cities.

It is undermining our institutions and destroying the country. There is but one way of meeting it. There is no use in temporizing or compromising with it. The issue is upon us. We have either to submit to its dictation or kill it. If the people are wise they will kill it. No matter what it costs, the run power must be destroyed. It has grown to too great proportions now, and it is time that it be killed. Pulverize the rum power.—Toledo Blade.

The Chicago

Weekly News

AND THE

Charlevoix Journal

ONE YEAR

For $2.00

THE CHICAGO WEEKLY NEWS is now an eight page, sixty four column paper, it is the largest "dollar weekly" in America. Its eight broad long pages present each week a mass of closely selected matter, containing much more than any other weekly. Its departments cover the entire circle of the family and the world. First and foremost it gives all the NEWS, complete as to details yet concise in form. Its connection with the CHICAGO DAILY NEWS (number of the Associated Press) gives it facilities for news gathering unsurpassed by any journal in the county. Its MARKET REPORTS are specially complete and thoroughly trustworthy. Particular attention is given to agricultural and home matters. Every week contains SIX COMPLETED STORIES, and a regular installment of an original story by some well-known English or American author, exclusively secured for the CHICAGO DAILY NEWS. Get dressed notes on fashions, art, industries, literature, science, etc., etc., appear regularly.

Few papers in the country are extensively quoted by the press in general for its bright and famous paragraphs as the Chicago Daily News. These are all reproduced in the WEEKLY NEWS. In its editorial expression its paper speaks from the standpoint of the independent journalist, thereby escaping the temptation to support or condone the questionable under the pressure of party allegiance. Mere partisan editorials will not like it; its fair-minded and thoughtful of all parties will appreciate and value its candid statements of facts and conclusions allowing to qualify the reader for the formation of his own intelligent opinion. The political events of the year promise to assume such a character that a thoroughly truthful and impartial record becomes all-important rather than a partisan one, colored and perverted to individual liking.

In all its departments the CHICAGO WEEKLY NEWS aims to present an enterprising, impartial and entertaining family newspaper of the very highest grade.

WHAT OLD SUBSCRIBERS SAY

Concise Record of the Week.

EASTERN.

New York was visited by a disastrous fire, which resulted in the total destruction of Schumacher & Ettinger's lithographic establishment, involving a loss of $350,000.

A corpse found in the Delaware River at Trenton, N. J., has been identified by several persons as that of S. S. Conant, the missing editor of Harper's Weekly.

A New York dispatch of the 30th ult. states that "Gen. Grant is rapidly losing strength, but he was reported at noon yesterday quite well. Minister Romero expressed fear that the General will close to-day within a few hours, by his disease reaching an artery. The General has expressed himself as being entirely in his physicians' hands, and said he would do whatever was suggested by them. Nothing whatever is kept from him in regard to his condition, and he was informed of its seriousness and probable termination. He received the statement that there were indications of a speedy end without change of expression, but he did not say anything about his feelings. He has known for some time that his disease was sure to kill, and has been ready at any time to go."

Holders of $21,000,000 Reading Railway securities have given assent to the reorganization plan.

Destitution is reported to be increasing in West Virginia. A correspondent says: "The sound of children crying for bread is heard in many quarters."

A New York dispatch of the 1st inst. reported Gen. Grant as much better. He enjoyed a good night's rest, partook of nourishment with relish, and did not suffer from choking, except once early in the morning.

The Mayor, three clergymen, and a dozen physicians of Worcester, Mass., have started a movement for the building of a crematorium.

Hiram H. Kimpton, once a broker in Wall street, with a fortune of $2,000,000, became an outcast from drink, and has been sent to a charitable institution in New York.

WESTERN.

Mrs. Sanford, Chicago, was burned to death by the fall of a hanging lamp under which she was reading. She ran out to a pool of water in the yard, leaving a trail of fire behind, and soon succumbed to her injuries.

Judge Dickey has lately sold his homestead on the bluff at Ottawa, Ill., where he settled forty years ago, retaining the family burying-ground, containing the remains of Gen. W. H. L. Wallace.

Indianapolis reports a case of blood poisoning said to have resulted from vaccination with bovine virus.

Ex-Gov. Thomas G. Fletcher, of Missouri, a prominent lawyer of St. Louis, has been missing from that city, and his friends are unable to account for his mysterious and unaccountable absence from home.

Perry H. Smith, formerly Vice President of the Northwestern Road, died at his residence in Chicago, of congestion of the liver. For some years his health has been extremely poor, and a consecutive war appeined for his death.

The Court House at St. Joseph, Mo., was burned, with the court records and law library. W. H. McDowell, chief of the Fire Department, received fatal injuries. The building was valued at $200,000.

A fire in Chicago destroyed the building alongside and in the rear of the Montauk Block, in Monroe street, occupied by the National Printing Company and Strauss, Smith & Co. The loss is $350,000. The same building was burned fifteen months ago. The insurance aggregates $112,500.

Tenants are still crossing on the ice at Mackinaw City, and the indications are that the straits will not be open until July 1. The ice, which is thirty to forty inches thick, is covered with three feet of snow.

Commissioner of Pensions Black has issued the following circular:

To Pension Agents—Investigations now in progress show that pensions to many persons in frauds have been perpetrated upon the Government through the disloyalty of clerks employed in pension agencies. You must be on the greatest care in respect to the selection of your subordinates. The Government, it is true, may be reimbursed from your bond for such losses as are forfeited to, but this does not prevent the mischief wished to be worked. This message of earnest caution is sent you to call your attention particularly to your own risk and duty in the premises. Investigate your agencies thoroughly. Take all possible precaution to cleanse the service of every suspicious or unworthy character.

POLITICAL.

There was a lively scene at one of the recent executive sessions of the United States Senate. Senator Eustis took occasion to denounce the political associates of his brother Senator, Blackburn and Jackson, as swindlers and regulators. The second Blackburnite replied with a furious attack upon Mr. Eustis, the consideration for which has largely been expended in the awards of Congress. The language was of the "fighting" kind, but Mr. Eustis neither gave nor has he now appeared to bear it.

Certain New York Democrats are said to be disgusted at President Cleveland's reappointment of Postmaster Pearson. According to the Chicago Times' Washington correspondent, "they say that if the President thought it necessary to especially emphasize his adherence to practical civil-service reform he could have done so very effectually by selecting for Pearson's successor a Democrat of high character, who would have carried out the theory that a great postoffice such as that at New York should be conducted upon purely business principles and without regard to partisan considerations. To go outside of the Democratic party to find such a man is for the President to confess that he could not find a Democrat who came up to the standard, or that he could not find one whom he was willing to trust to carry out his policy. They say that the effect of Pearson's nomination and confirmation would almost inevitably be to leave many less in the Democratic party in New York, and that the majority can be fully repaired even by filling all of the important federal offices in that city with active Democratic partisans."

MISCELLANEOUS.

Secretary Raymond received a dispatch from the United States minister at Panama, on the 31st ult., informing him that Colo. Pedro, the rebel leader, had seized the Pacific steamship Colon and imprisoned the captain and purser, the agent of the company, Consul Wright, and other Americans. Secretary Whitney has telegraphed to Admiral Jouett, who is now at New Orleans, to proceed to Key West with the Tennessee and Swatara and there await further instructions. The commander of the Alliance, now at Key West, has been ordered to Aspinwall. The Secretary also has dispatched to Commander Kane of the Galena, at Aspinwall, directing him to afford all possible protection to American citizens. Her Majesty's steamer Lily, on nearing the wharf at Colon, was fired upon and retired to Aspinwall.

Advices from Battleford, Northwest Territory, to April 1, confirm the report that the Indians have seized the town. They were preparing to attack the barracks where the inhabitants were intrenched. Sir John Macdonald said in the Canadian Parliament that he had received two dispatches from the Governor-General intimating that the Indian revolt at Battleford was imminent, but that a satisfactory solution, and the other that Crowfoot, Chief of the Blackfeet, had promised to be loyal. Crowfoot is the most powerful chief of the Northwest, but his word is not to be depended upon. He is said to have 1,000 men with him. Troops are being sent to the front as fast as possible from every direction.

Dispatches from Battleford, in the Northwest territory, on the 30th ult., report that the Stony Creek Indians have retreated to Poundmaker's reserve, about eighteen miles distant, but contemplate an immediate return. The savages are numerous in the white settlers. Advices from Winnipeg say that the barracks at Battleford, where the inhabitants are intrenched, are closely besieged.

At a conference held in Washington between the Secretaries of State and the Navy and the Attorney General, it was decided that the United States has by treaty guaranteed uninterrupted transit across the Isthmus of Panama. The available marines at the Brooklyn Navy Yard and some fighting guns will probably be shipped soon by a land transportation.

The following dispatch from Commander Kane, of the United States war steamer Galena, has been received at the Navy Department: "Aspinwall is in ashes. It was burned by the insurgents to escape capture by the Government forces. The Pacific Mail dock, the railroad property on the north end of the island, and the coal property at Colgord are the only buildings saved. The ship piping is safe. I have all my force ashore protecting the Pacific Mail dock in concert with refugees. Thousands are destitute and without shelter."

Forty men were buried alive by an explosion in the mines of the Bowman Orran Mining Company at Trappin, in Austrian Silesia. Job are believed to have perished. An explosion in the mines at Rothehild, in Moravia, killed fifty-six men.

At the reopening of the French Chamber of Deputies on the 31st ult., peace was proclaimed in the streets by a large force of mounted troops. The crowds in Paris received the news in silence. Premier Ferry was loudly hissed. He presented a request for a credit of $100,000,000 for military operations in China, which was promptly voted down, by 308 to 116. The resignation of the Ministry was immediately announced. Henri Rochefort printed an article demanding the head of Premier Ferry for his blunders in Tonquin.

Admiral Digna is said to have withdrawn his whole force to Tamanieb, where he proposes to give battle to Gen. Graham, who has called large reinforcements to Berber.

It is said that a French advance upon Pelin is for the present impossible. In Freycinet will not be able to send more than 15,000 men to Tonquin, and there will be considerable delay owing to lack of transports. The Chamber of Deputies on the 31st ult. voted the first installment of $18,000,000 of the Tonquin credit of $40,000,000 asked for by Prime Minister Ferry. The Government received a dispatch from Gen. Brie announcing the War Office to send him reenforcements immediately. A great banquet in Paris is expected from Cochin China.

Queen Victoria and her daughter Beatrice left Balmoral on route for Aix-les-Bains, in the South of France.

The wives of nearly 2,000 Turkish soldiers marched in a body to the office of the Finance Minister in Constantinople, to demand arrears of pay due the army for several months. The women drove away the police, listened to excuses by the Minister, and then forced him to leap from a back window.

LATER NEWS ITEMS.

At about 5 o'clock on the morning of Thursday, April 2, the relatives of Gen. Grant were summoned to his bedside, his dissolution being momentarily expected. The patient rallied after the hypodermic injection of brandy had been given, and fell into a troubled sleep. At 9:30 he desired to get up to a chair, but was restrained, and until noon slept in his armchair, awakening with the pulse stronger and his condition more comfortable. The improvement continued during the afternoon, and an examination of his throat disclosed the fact that the ulcerations had lost their angry appearance. He became cautious at times, walking up and down the floor, but became more calm about 8:30 o'clock, when he took the record of his own pulse and temperature, and he suffered no pain, and desired that his family engage in conversation with him. During the day no one but Mr. Cyrus W. Field, Stephen H. Elkins, the members of the family, and Dr. Newman was allowed to see the patient. When Mr. Field went away he was very cheerful, turning over from his side to sleep "as marvelous," he said. "His force of will and his courage are astonishing. Just three days ago, he walked across the room instead of being carried like a sick person." Gen. Grant was feeling better than he had for days. The family rejoice in the belief that Mr. Field was there. Gen. Grant determined to take his own temperature and to count his pulse. He set a stop-watch and placed it on his lap, and then put the thermometer in his mouth. Years to him he left went to his right hand and began counting the beats, gazing forward as he spoke, and he was counting toward the hour. The thermometer rose to 98. His hands were engaged, and the thermometer in his mouth prevented him making sentences. The watch was just falling when Dr. Shrady caught it. The General seemed anxious to talk a good deal. The doctors and family discouraged it. The General rested well during the night.

President Cleveland informed the Utah Commission that his administration would lend all the aid possible to purge Utah of the practice of polygamy.

Gentlemen's Suits in England.

Gentlemen do not in London think of getting a new hat every year. Every gentleman has one hat, and that, if not a lady is by no means necessary that it should be new or stylish—it has to last a lifetime. Gentlemen do not, as it seemed to me with the Londoner to be an evidence of his well-nourished mind, as well as a substantial gentleman.

"Arry" out for a half holiday might wear a new and shining hat for which he paid his nine shillings; but my Lord Greystoke would pass him in his old hat, wearing an immensely tall and immensely heavy hat that must be several years old, and good for the gentleman for another term.—*London Cor. THE DEATH PENALTY.

William Neal, the Notorious Ashland (Ky.) Murderer, Hanged.

(Grayson (Ky.) special.)

Last evening, about 7 o'clock, the last of the Ashland murderers, was brought from Mount Sterling by a Sheriff and a posse of seven armed men, who had accompanied him. A DOZEN DEAD.

Riel Defeats Crozier's Force Near Duck Lake, Killing Twelve and Wounding Eleven.

The Police Retreat—Loss of the Dead and Hurt—The Dominion Aroused.

The First Battle.

In the House of Commons Tuesday the following dispatch from Lieut. Col. Irvine to Sir John Macdonald, dated Fort Carlton, via Winnipeg, March 27, was read by the Premier: "The party under my command has just arrived. When near Fort Carlton I found that Maj. Crozier, with a party of 100, had gone to Duck Lake to secure a large quantity of supplies he had stored. They were met by some hundred rebels, who held an advantageous position at Beardy's Reserve, and endeavored to surround Major Crozier's force of police and civilians. The rebels fired first. When the firing became general Major Crozier, owing to the disparity of numbers, thought it prudent to withdraw and left the ground, retreated in good order, arriving at the fort at the same time as my party. Ten civilians of Prince Albert and five mounted police were killed, and ten civilians and seven constables were wounded. The number of rebels killed is not known. The police and civilians acted with the greatest coolness and bravery. The rebel loss was estimated at eight."

Following this was a dispatch from Capt. Gibson, of the mounted police: Constable Arnold, of the mounted police, Corp. Dowsley, Privates Gerrie, Cowan, Gibbons, John Morton, W. Snyder, James Bickley, William Scott, Charles Hewitt, Robert Middleton, James Anderson, H. McCrimon, D. McLeod, Alex. Fisher. The bodies of the above were brought in, and were recognized by Prince Albert. The wounded are: Of the mounted police, Inspector Dixon, Corporal Gilchrist, Constable Garrett, Constables S. F. Gordon, Comerford, Smith, Connolly, Wood, Constable Miller. Of the volunteers corps, Capt. Moore, A. McNabb, W. H. Markly, Alex. Stewart.

SOLDIERS AND SQUAWKERS.

The Government is unchosen to have information concerning the Prince Indian uprising with the Northwest rebellion, and will make it a subject of international correspondence with the United States authorities. A rumor is current that they supplied the Metis with arms and ammunition and money to carry on warlike operations. Two-thirds private detectives have been dispatched to various American cities and towns on the American borders by the immediate vicinity of the troubles.

TENDER OF SERVICES.

Many telegrams have been received from Canadians in the United States offering their services to the end of any further trouble, and militia organizations in various directions have offered themselves for service to proceed to Carlston on a moment's notice. Among the offers of service, that of the Governor of Montana, Gen. Crosby, Alfred Trowbridge, in his telegram to the Premier, he proved to declare that "neither politics nor party is quite strong in Montana when it comes to a question of patriotism." The offer of personal influences has yet to be measured and tested before it can be seen whether either party is traveling ahead of the regular patriotic channels.

The truth is in half of this assertion. The Republican party must necessarily go down in the contest, for the two can and will be known. It was a sort of Republican hypocrisy brought on by anti-slavery prejudice, but the time has arrived when this faction must die. Sectionalism has disappeared, and its vitality is gone. It has no saving principles—no inherent or elementary strength. As for Democracy, which is the party of the people, and which expresses their faith in the Government and their interpretation of its nature, it will survive several political experiences like Republicanism, and confound the predictions of many sagacious writers like Gath. Economic questions may control public opinion, but Democracy will show itself capable of presenting the best practical policy for the country. It is hardly true, as Mr. Twomey intimates, that "the West and South will drop out of party lines within a year or two, the moment the mongrel party power in the East, Seven Democratic people who have always claimed that a Democratic victory would be a disastrous one for both parties are all the more emphatic in that opinion now. The Democratic party is not the party of the mistakes of its predecessors in having less of a partisan sentiment.

The pen picture of this correspondent is hardly more than picturesque when he declares that:

"Republicans and Democrats seemed never so near together as they have been in the past. No questions of mark divide the parties, and the United States Government at this moment is probably the most friendly in the world in its integral elements. The Democrats have got power without being very much for it, and the Republicans have lost power rather to their relief. The side is tired, and the other side is not very anxious to come in."—Atlanta (Ga.) Chronicle.

A Constitution that Was Rejected.

Somebody sent the Chicago Herald a newspaper containing a masked article wherein the election of Gen. Logan is urged and a failure to do so is considered as a sure sign that the republic is in its decline. To this the Herald replies by saying that whether Logan, Morrison, or some other man not yet named shall be elected to the United States Senate will not make the slightest difference with the future of the American republic.

Union soldiers have been defeated in this country through political considerations a great many times. Andrew Jackson was once defeated for the Presidency by a civilian, as were Gens. Winfield Scott and George B. McClellan. Gen. Hancock was beaten for the Presidency by a man who never saw half the fighting that he did. Gen. Ewing was overwhelmed as a Democratic candidate for Governor of Ohio by a man who was selling coffins while the war was in progress. Gen. Beaver was beaten for Governor of Pennsylvania by a young man who was in school when Gettysburg was fought. Gen. Wadsworth was defeated as a candidate for Governor of New York by a civilian, though he left the army with his arm in a sling, and he had to get it met his dead. Hundreds of like cases might be multiplied, but those are sufficient for the purpose.

Men who enter armies are compelled to abide by the fortunes of war. Soldiers who become politicians must have before the fortunes of politics. What the people think of their defenders is shown by the votes cast and the fact that thousands of them have engaged and are now engaging public honor. No rule can be laid down, that a soldier who enters politics shall always be successful or that when he becomes a grocer or dry goods merchant he will always be what he will invariably make money. Moreover, there are hundreds of thousands of Democratic soldiers in this country whose the party to which Logan and the Washington cigan belong has never warmed itself about and whose failure to secure public office when any Republican civilian wanted it has been marked. If it has not disrupted the Republic to keep them in private life it certainly will not to give Gen. Logan a vacation after twenty years of constant service.

Gath as a Prophet.

The fact that President Cleveland has been elected with less of partisan surroundings than recent executives, has led to the belief that party lines as at present drawn are fast giving way and that the great questions of the people will disintegrate. George Alfred Townsend, in his inauguration letter, is moved to declare that "neither political party is quite certain of its fortune or even its personal stability. The play of personal influences has yet to be measured and tested before it can be seen whether either party is traveling ahead of the regular patriotic channels."

The truth is in half of this assertion. The Republican party must necessarily go down in the contest, for the two can and will be known. It was a sort of Republican hypocrisy brought on by anti-slavery prejudice, but the time has arrived when this faction must die. Sectionalism has disappeared, and its vitality is gone. It has no saving principles—no inherent or elementary strength. As for Democracy, which is the party of the people, and which expresses their faith in the Government and their interpretation of its nature, it will survive several political experiences like Republicanism, and confound the predictions of many sagacious writers like Gath. Economic questions may control public opinion, but Democracy will show itself capable of presenting the best practical policy for the country. It is hardly true, as Mr. Twomey intimates, that "the West and South will drop out of party lines within a year or two, the moment the mongrel party power in the East. Seven Democratic people who have always claimed that a Democratic victory would be a disastrous one for both parties are all the more emphatic in that opinion now. The Democratic party is not the party of the mistakes of its predecessors in having less of a partisan sentiment.

The pen picture of this correspondent is hardly more than picturesque when he declares that:

"Republicans and Democrats seemed never so near together as they have been in the past. No questions of mark divide the parties, and the United States Government at this moment is probably the most friendly in the world in its integral elements. The Democrats have got power without being very much for it, and the Republicans have lost power rather to their relief. The side is tired, and the other side is not very anxious to come in."—Atlanta (Ga.) Chronicle.

Tried to Kill an Editor.

"What's the news, my dear?" asked Mrs. Smith of her husband, after he had read his morning paper.

"Oh, nothing special. I see that a Frenchman entered a newspaper office in Paris yesterday and killed the editor, but the editor succeeded in killing his antagonist."

"Good! goody!" exclaimed Mrs. Smith. "Served him right. How did the editor kill the Frenchman?"

"He editor was newly married," replied Smith, "and I guess he indured the Frenchman to eat some of his wife's cooking."—Newman Independent.

While the ladies' fair was in progress at Dallas, a gentleman from the country who was smoking a cheap cigar, after peering into the door for a while, said:

"I would like to go in."

"You know you have two things to get in."

"What be they?"

"One is a ticket, and the other is no cigar in your mouth."—Texas Siftings.

PREPARING FOR THE CONTEST.

Active war preparations throughout England continue, and not alone the days of the Crimea has the excitement been so great. The belief has rapidly grown within the past few days that a war with Russia is inevitable, and the war fever is now strong upon the people. The activity at the arsenals and dockyards is almost unprecedented. Large forces of men are employed both day and night filling the heavy orders already out in by both the War and Admiralty offices. Already the government arsenals are taxed to their utmost, and no urgent are some of the orders that contracts have been made with private firms. At the dockyards vessels are being fitted out for instant departure, some of which are having been placed under sailing orders for years.

The Queen's message in calling out the reserves and militia is as follows:

"The present state of public affairs and the attitude of the Russian Government in military forces for the protection of the interests of the empire having constituted, in the opinion of her Majesty, a case of great public emergency, her Majesty deems it proper to provide additional means for military service. She has therefore thought it right to communicate to the House of Commons that she is about to call out the reserve forces and such proportion of the militia as may be deemed necessary to be called out for permanent service."

The call issued by the War Office, in accordance with the Queen's message, is for 25,000 reserves and 14,000 militia.

The patriotic response which received by the country with great enthusiasm. Lacrosse is especially marked at the various military stations throughout the kingdom. Everywhere active efforts are being exerted to get barracks ready for the reception of the troops and accommodation at hand to equip them. The immense quantities of war stores are ready to be distributed when required. The war feeling is strong among the reserves, and many had already volunteered for service before the order summoning them to service was received.

In proof of the energy of the preparations, it is stated that contracts for 12,000 tons of coal to be delivered in India has been made; that 150,000 uniforms have been ordered; that 5,000,000 rifle cartridges are to be sent to India within ten days, and that ten torpedo-boats are in course of construction. Such transfering of rifles, overhauling of vessels, and fitting up of army quarters has not been seen in England in several years.

The arming of the nation is, however, beset by some difficulties. On no account is the military force in Ireland to be reduced. It is intended to send 25,000 more English infantry to Ireland, thus releasing 25,000 regular troops. This will be a dangerous operation, for the presence of the milit

THE ELECTIONS.

The County Seat Lost—Morse Elected.

We have delayed our paper several hours hoping to get returns from the state, but on account of no mail being received at this place since Tuesday, we can give nothing but home news. A telegram received on Tuesday afternoon concedes Morse's election by a large majority.

County Seat Removal.

The county seat is to be removed, by a large majority of the votes of the county. The four towns yet to report are favorable to removal. The following is the vote as far as received:

	For.	Against.
Bear Lake	21	12
Charlevoix	6	340
Evangeline	288	2
Eveline	158	65
Hayes	2	124
Marion	5	98
Melrose	50	4
Norwood	4	96
South Arm	393	1
Springvale	40	4
Wilson	113	....
Totals	1,077	746
Majority	331

Supervisors Elected.

In all the towns heard from the old supervisors were re-elected except in Charlevoix, Eveline, and South Arm.

Bear Lake—E. C. Plettenphea.
Charlevoix—Oscar Upright.
Evangeline—H. A. Jersey.
Eveline—Ava Smith.
Hayes—E. H. Burgess.
Marion—John Ward.
Melrose—J. Jordan.
Norwood—Wm. Harris.
South Arm—J. A. Kent.
Springvale—A. W. Abbay.
Wilson—Geo. W. Bailey.

State Officers.

Below we give the entire vote on state officers in all the towns heard from. It will be seen that Morse ran ahead of his ticket in all towns where the attorneys got in their work.

	Morse.	Co. Ticket.	Morse Maj.	Co. Ticket Maj.
Charlevoix	22	57	10	12
Evangeline	177	111	144	103

Wilson	82	59	77	54

The Vote for Morse.

For purposes of comparison the vote of Begole last fall is given to show how much Morse ran ahead of his party ticket. This has no political significance, for he was supported by the soldier vote almost unanimously without regard to party.

Township Officers.

CHARLEVOIX.

In Charlevoix there were two tickets, republican and union. The republican ticket was voted on Friday evening, and the union on Saturday evening. The republican nominations for clerk and treasurer were endorsed by the union caucus. The republicans elected supervisor, highway commissioner, and three constables, the union justice of the peace, school inspector, and one constable. The following is the vote in detail.

	Vote.	Maj.
Supervisor—Charles B. Gibbs	169	3
Clerk—Rufus S. Hayden	180	33
Treasurer—Henry C. Cooper	146	36
Justice of Peace—H. W. Kane	209	72
" " —A. Washburn	136
School Inspector—J. Mile Eaton	172	1
" " —Geo. Gidley	171
Highway Com'r—Wm. H. Taylor	184	35
" " —N. Naldien	149	41
Constables—A. C. Draper, 184, Geo. Pepin 183, Henry Barth 143, Thos. Bush 135, Jos. Bourdo 135, Wm. F. Parson 131, A. E. Upright 127, G. W. Crosby 112, Isaac Rhodes 85.

EVANGELINE.

The voters in this town had a choice of two tickets, the union, H. A. Jersey, supervisor, and another headed "East Jordan or bust." The result shows that the latter got "busted." R. M. Caldwell for treasurer, and Melvin Houghtlin for justice, had no opposition. W. J. Lewis for clerk, and Z. N. Garfoot for justice received most flattering votes: The vote in detail is as follows:

	Vote.	Maj.
Supervisor—H. A. Jersey	201	32
" —Alfred Vanderwalker	169
Clerk—Wm. J. Lewis	178
" —Charles E. Hale	53	150
Treasurer—R. M. Caldwell	174
Justice full term—Jed Houghtlin	209
Justice vacancy—Z. N. Garfoot	209	159
School Inspector—C. H. Shepard	87
" " —S. T. Hicks	65	22
Highway Com'r—J. E. Crane	163
" " —J. D. Kordyke	160
Constables—F. M. Gates 169, Wm. Hanson 164, Wm. H. Corwin 207, J. R. Fellows 208, M. V. Wolf 213, A. J. Hall 157.

EVELINE.

There is every evidence of a hot contest in this town, with the majority inclines somewhat divided between two tickets. On the county seat question, Charlevoix had been led to believe a majority would oppose removal, but the returns very quickly dispelled the illusion.

	Vote.	Maj.
Supervisor—Ava Smith	128	1
" —E. A. Crane	128
Clerk—Wm. H. Malkin	129
" —Walter Mason	132	12
Treasurer—E. Lake	128
" —H. E. Simpson	127
Justice—A. E. Nayes	132	10
" —T. C. Washburn	122
School Inspector—T. Hartley	127
" " —Geo. Gidley	125	8
Highway Com'r—John Stewart	127
" " —M. A. Sedley	125	253
Constables—C. Jackson, H. Rowland, W. Zimmerman, Wm. Henry.

HAYES.

Two tickets were in the field, citizens and people's, and the former was successful except the highway commissioner. Moses Cooper was an independent candidate for treasurer, and made an excellent run. The following is the vote:

	Vote.	Maj.
Supervisor—E. H. Burgess	75	30
Clerk—A. W. Chase	49	47
Treasurer—A. W. Cooper	42	36
" —Moses Cooper	90	6
Justice—Jos. Gaskill	71	35
" —J. Shaffer	46
School Inspector—C. H. Whitford	71	22
" " —J. Spencer	51
Highway C'm'r—T. S. Newcomb	73
" " —J. Howe	38	12
Constables—S. V. Salyer 61, W. W. Wilford 66, A. S. Norman 48, A. Arnold 65, Frank Sanders 45, Frank Lamett 47, George McRoberts 46, A. Kewaguom 46.

MARION.

In Marion township there was but one ticket. The old offices were re-elected in every case except school inspector and highway commissioner. For the latter office, Michael Noy came in as an independent candidate, getting 35 votes. The following is the ticket elected.

	Begole, 1882.	Morse, 1885.
Supervisor—John Wood.
Clerk—Wm. Hanchett, Jr.
Treasurer—James Lyons.
School Inspector—George Anderson.
Highway Commissioner—Silas Anderson.

MELROSE.

	Vote.	Maj.
Supervisor—James Lyman	59	7
Clerk—Willis Keyes	59	42
Treasurer—N. N. Curd	53
" —John Jones	52
School Inspector—A. J. Hitchcock	52

Constables—Jos. Gardner 52, S. F. Lord 52, James Wells 52, Frank Hyslop 52.

* Plurality.

NORWOOD.

There was no contest here except on justice for full term, and while the opposition was young and vigorous, it was not sufficiently strong to defeat the old and tried servant who was to be elected his own successor. The following is the ticket as elected:

	Begole, 1882.	Morse, 1885.
Supervisor—William Harris.
Clerk—Jos. Gaskill.
Treasurer—E. Frenette.
Justice (full term)—O. B. Hilton.
Justice (vacancy)—George R. Gayles.
School Inspector—L. V. Nash.
Highway Commissioner—William Pearl.
Constables—L. D. Hilton, E. Trebelle, George H. Nash, L. Pearl.

SOUTH ARM.

Owing to delay in mails we have not received our regular returns from this town. The principal officers elected are as follows:

	Vote.	Maj.
Supervisor—J. A. Kent.
Clerk—P. L. Lamont.
Treasurer—H. B. Bipp.
Justice—M. W. Ford.
Highway Com'r—J. Isaman.

SPRINGVALE.

Only partial returns were received from this town:

	Vote.	Maj.
Supervisor—L. Lewis	19
" —A. W. Abbey	25	6
Clerk—A. C. Hoskins
Treasurer—N. N. Wilkinson	19	6
Justice—Jos. Gardner	25	6
School Inspector—A. L. Spencer	44
Highway Com'r—M. Spencer	44

WILSON.

There was but a partial contest in this town, all the principle officers having no opposition. The officers elected are as follows:

	Vote.	Maj.
Supervisor—Geo. W. Bailey	112	111
Clerk—Wm. Bennett
Treasurer—Jos. Sinclair	112	15
School Inspector—N. M. Richardson	79	39
" " —S. Slaughter	53	54
Highway Com'r—Jos. S. Kibbe	87	27
" " —George Brown	60

We aim always to lead in these matters, and as our friends become accustomed to our system of work we shall be still better able to give complete and reliable news on the shortest possible notice.

Now for Business.

The county seat is gone—gone from Charlevoix forever—but the natural resources and advantages of Charlevoix are the same as yesterday or last week. This is the commercial metropolis of the Pine Lake region. The hills and valleys surrounding the inland lakes contribute their wealth of hardwood and cedar timber, and their agricultural products, to our coffers wherever possible. The waters of lake Michigan annually yield up hundreds of tons of choicest fish. All these must pass through our gates before being distributed to the ends of the earth. Still we not propose all those articles for the market, so as to ship as little as possible of refuse matter! If we do, we must get to business. Charlevoix should dress up ready for use a much larger portion than she does of the millions of feet of hardwood and pine lumber now shipped to other ports rough, for finishing there. Charlevoix should use some portion of the vast quantities of pig iron made at her very doors. Charlevoix should give some encouragement to farmers to cultivate more carefully their agricultural land, and thus increase the food product. Charlevoix should do something to give winter employment to the many who are now compelled to go out of town on the last bent in the fall, and not return until April or May following. These men must be employed here all the year before we can be truly successful.

The struggle for commercial supremacy is now with East Jordan. She is at the head of navigation. She is surrounded with a vast country, just as rich in resources as any in northern Michigan. She has captured the county seat, by the aid of which she hopes to so advance her business interests as to secure a railroad in the near future. She will strain every nerve to so increase her population with her business that her votes, with those naturally friendly, will control all future elections in her favor. Will Charlevoix sit down, like a petulant, disappointed child, and let East Jordan do all this without making an effort to stay the tide? Or will she forget and forgive all petty local jealousies which have in the past been her chief stumbling block in the way of success?

Do not begin the struggle by nursing all the little back-bitings and jealousies that can be found, and by pulling East Jordan down, but rather by taking hold earnestly and good naturedly of every enterprise that will add one dollar in wealth or one voter to the population of our village. Rise above petty spite and bickerings, and strive cheerfully and manfully for real merit at home.

Trombling Officials.

Lansing, March 31.—The special committee to investigate and report upon the condition of the various State departments have been for a long time unable to do any thing owing to a resistance of a portion of the members of the committee to co-operate in the work. The committee met this afternoon and sunsun med before them State Superintendent of Public Instruction Gross. He admitted that he had varied from his deputy a commission announting to thirty-three per cent. of the amount which the deputy is allowed as his pay for the year. Since the subpœna had been served for his appearance before the committee, Superintendent Gass said he had paid back to Deputy Smith $100 of this amount.

The committee are conducting the investigation in secret. They will continue the work, and a deal of fluttering begins to be apparent. It is a common rumor that the heads of other State departments are grating upon the subpœnas of their attaches.—[Free Press.

The boys of the Grand Army of the republic in Michigan have redeemed themselves of the suspicions of being solely a republican auxiliary, by standing shoulder to shoulder in support of their one armed comrade and in defense of the rights of the people against the quibbling decisions of the corporation lawyer.

The Detroit Evening News has stood manfully to the work of showing the people the true sentiments of Cooley's many decisions in favor of wealthy corporations and against private citizens and workingmen; and to that paper is due much of the credit for Cooley's defeat.

The result is a just rebuke to the paid agents of the octopus that is ever winding its slimy coils about the throats of poor laboring men who are forced by circumstances within its reach.

The Dodge investigating committee of the Michigan legislature is making some excellent campaign material. The g. o. p. doesn't seem to be such a pure, innocent party after all.

The vote for Morse is a deserved compliment from his comrades in arms, who honor his patriotism and bravery.

Allen B. Morse is a democrat, true blue, but this is not a democratic victory in a political sense.

How to Regain a Lost Voice.

A broken-down old German actor at Riga induced Caroline Baiser to appear at a performance announced for his benefit. On the appointed day, however, she had completely lost her voice from the effects of a severe cold, and the poor man was in despair, since his tickets had been sold entirely on the strength of the promised appearance of the Berlin actress, and if she failed him he would be required to refund the money, the greater part of which was already expended. He had a wife and many children; would she not, in pity for them, try his remedy for hoarseness? It was a very severe one, "too terribly Russian for a delicate lady, but—" "And this remedy?" "Well, you must let a whole quart of scalding hot beer pass slowly and uninterruptedly down your throat." "Is that all?" "No; there is something more, honored fraulein," said Dolle humbly; "boil cordial, in it you must hold a hollow candle—a good thick one, four to the pound—in the boiling beer, and stir it about till nothing but the wick is left." The kind-hearted actress shuddered, but consented to swallow the nauseous draught, and by evening had completely recovered her voice.—The Fortnightly Review.

HE STRONG.

BY CHRISTIANNA W. BROWN.

When troubles come, and you
As I would have you into wrong,
Let your in others' eyes rise the son,
Quit yourself as Man ought to behave!

Plead not your failures, or whom
Where a duty's ones alone;
Grapple with it bravely, manly,
Quit yourselves like men, be strong!

Be not bowed down by your sorrow,
Be the light and right of the wrong,
Bear me, or be a coward father,
Heal communion you to be strong.

In life's battle-march, all triumphs
Are not won by the strong
Cowardly souls have been scoundrel
And humanity strong.

Trust and fear not; that, for life can,
With retired ones in the room,
And to others will aught you,
If, in its strength, you be strong.

When faith gives you hair courage,
And fear can shall make you stand,
Life will prove a heavy-laden voyage,
And to end will with a song.

"FOUR DOLLARS A WEEK."

BY M. A. H.

"I wish I could do something to earn some money," sighed pretty Flossie Templeton, as she leaned idly out of the window. "Here I am, 19 years old, six other children younger than I, and no one to work for us all but poor father. I really am ashamed of myself! But what can I do? I attended Woodley Seminary for more than two years, but, for all that, I don't know enough to teach school. I can't teach music; all I can play is a few polkas and waltzes. I can't even do fancy work for sale. The only thing I can good for is to do housework, and mamma would faint if I should ever so much as mention going away to work in somebody's kitchen.

Her mournful soliloquy was interrupted by her little sister, who came into the room bringing a letter.

"Is that for me, Mamie?" asked "Yes," answered the little girl, resigning herself to a hug of sisterly affection.

"Why, it's from my old room-mate at Woodley Seminary," and hastily tearing it open, Flossie was soon lost in its contents.

The letter contained the information that her old school friend was now living in a town only five miles distant, and that she was going away that afternoon to make a visit of several months.

But one part of the letter was more interesting to Flossie than any other. The writer asked if Flossie knew of any good girl whom her mother could get to do general housework. Hired help was scarce in the town, and her mother would be willing to pay a good girl four dollars a week.

Flossie read this part over two or three times, and a plan matured itself in her busy brain.

"Why, couldn't I do housework for them?" she thought, "and earn four dollars a week? I have no friends in Freeport except Ida herself, and she went away the day this letter was written. I am pretend to mamma that I am going to visit Ida Copeland for a month or two, and I will go the cheaper an earnest name and work for them. The very thing!"

And sitt up in the face of one naughty girl, showing the sweet little dimples in chin and cheek, and making her irresistibly charming.

She went to her room and put the letter away; then lifting the lid of her trunk, she took from a box a sixteen in a small case, and gazed at it long and thoughtfully.

"I don't know what Norman Erlington would say if he knew of my working as a servant," she thought, "but really there is nothing else I can do. I am ashamed to stay at home and be a burden to my father. Of course I do most of the work, but then mamma and the little girls can do it well enough when I am gone. Well, I don't likely I'll see Norman again, so it doesn't make much difference what he would think."

Norman Erlington, whose picture she had in her possession, was a young collegian who had spent the previous summer visiting relatives in the town. He had paid more attention to Flossie than to any of the other village belles, and, as he was handsome and stylish, it no wonder the heart of our little maiden was touched. On going away, he had asked permission to write to her, but as she had never received any letters she came to the conclusion that he had forgotten her.

The next morning Flossie told her mother that she wanted to go to Freeport to stay a month or two.

"I received a letter from Ida Copeland yesterday, and you know I have never been away to visit since I came home from school over a year ago."

"I wish you could go," said Mrs. Templeton, a feeble woman who still seemed to be making an effort to be fashionable, "but you have no clothes fit. Is your friend very stylish?"

"She didn't use to be," answered Flossie, carefully.

"Well, if you think your clothes will do, I will be glad to have you go. Perhaps you will have an opportunity to see some good society there. I would like to get you a new dress, but your father's salary is so small, and the children wear out so many shoes that——"

"O, never mind me, mamma; I'll do very well," said, singing cryly. Flossie ran off to pack her trunk.

The next day, when the daughter parted with her mother at the depot, she said:

"Now, mamma, don't expect me to write to you while I am away, for you know I'd feel bound to write."

"Very well, my dear. Have as good a time as you can," and, with a loving kiss, they parted

"Poor mamma!" thought Flossie, as the train sped on its way. "Wouldn't she be horrified if she knew I am going to apply for a place in Mrs. Copeland's kitchen!"

In a few minutes the town of Freeport was reached, and the young girl stood looking around her on a rather bewildered way. The first thing she did was to ask a man standing near the way to Mrs. Copeland's residence. As the town was a small one, he was able to give her minute directions. Bowing her thanks, she started on a brisk walk for the designated place.

On reaching the lion, a, which was a tine brick one, she was about to ascend the steps and ring the bell, but recollecting herself, went around to the side door. In answer to her timid knock a lady came to the door.

"Is Mrs. Copeland in," inquired Flossie.

"I am Mrs. Copeland," the lady answer, replied. "Won't you come in?"

"I heard that you wanted a girl to do general housework, so I came to see if I could get the place," said Flossie, blushing deeply.

"Dear me! Do you know I wanted to engage a girl?" asked Mrs. Copeland.

"Yes, I received a letter from your daughter Ida," replied Flossie.

"O, then you are a girl Miss Templeton! Very well, it is all right, I suppose you can do all kinds of work?"

"Yes, ma'am; I think so."

"What is your name?"

"Rachel Day."

After a few more questions, all of which Flossie answered satisfactorily, Mrs. Copeland engaged her for a month.

The room to which she was afterward shown was neat and clean, but rather poor in its appointments, and Flossie thought, with a regretful sigh, of her own pleasant room at home. "I almost wish I hadn't come," she sighed, as she descended the stairs.

Mrs. Copeland was so kind and pleasant in her instructions, and her new girl was so quick to understand, that they were mutually pleased. Work was no hardship for Flossie, for she had been accustomed to it from her earliest infancy; besides the family at this time was small, consisting only of Mr. and Mrs. Copeland.

Mrs. Copeland was rather reserved, so Flossie did not learn much about the family affairs, although she was listened eagerly whenever Ida's name was mentioned. From what was said, however, she could see that the mother loved her daughter as few daughters are loved.

One day when her mistress was away, Flossie, having finished her work, wandered into the parlor. Seating herself at the grand piano, she ran over the keys with her little ungloved hands. Presently the random notes resolved themselves into one of her favorite waltzes. Growing tired at last, she rose up and began to examine the articles on a table near. The chief attraction was a beautifully colored photograph of Ida.

"How beautiful she is!" murmured the little servant, gazing at the sweet face. "But then she always was lovely. When does her face remind me of? Some one I know, but I can't think who. I wonder if I am half as pretty as she is?"

For answer she turns to the mirror, in which she can see herself from head to foot.

She sees a pair of wistful, questioning eyes, flushed cheeks, beautifully dimpled; brown hair, combed in fluffy waves over the forehead; shell-like ears, and a little reticuse mouth, a fine, girlish face, which you or I could not have seen without wanting to kiss.

The door was pushed a little ajar, and a young man stood looking at the pretty picture. Evidently his look of admiration turned to one of astonishment. Advancing into the room, he exclaimed, holding out both hands:

"Why, Flossie Templeton, how glad I am to see you! I came in quietly, intending to surprise my mother, but I never thought of seeing you here."

At his first word Flossie had ran away from the mirror, mortified beyond expression.

"Oh, Mr. Erlington! what must you think of me, seeing me standing looking at myself! You must think me a vain, so silly!" she cried, her face all aglow.

"I think now, what I thought then, that you made the prettiest picture I ever saw. If I were half as pretty I would look at myself all the time," said the woman, frankly.

An awkward little pause ensues. Flossie is greatly disturbed by the thought of her position in the house, and Norman, for the first time noticing her calico dress and big pinafore apron, is surprised to find her so strangely dressed.

"I must go to the kitchen," said Flossie, by a great effort breaking the silence. "I might not to be in here at all. I am Mrs. Copeland's servant."

"What?" exclaimed the astonished Norman. "Surely you are not working for my mother?"

"If Mrs. Copeland is your mother, I must certainly do so. I have often heard her speak of her daughter, but I never heard her mention you."

Seeing Norman still looked incredulous, she went on:

"I wanted to earn some money for myself, so when Ida Copeland, who was my dearest school friend, wrote and asked me to tell them of some good girl to do general housework, I thought I would come myself. Ida was going away on a visit, your mother never saw me, and so I came here and gave my name as Rachel Day. No one would have been any the wiser for my little experiment if you had not known me."

She concluded her stor with a merry laugh, not looking a bit like the big girl of a minute ago, but as Norman was forced to laugh, too.

"I would not be have thought you could gain your mother's consent," said he.

"O, she doesn't know myself g ah at it. She thinks I am visiting there."

"Then it is nothing but a white, and now, since you have gratified it, you must stop work and make a visit."

"It is not a white," objected Flossie; "I am working to earn money. Your mother would pay me a week, and I think I earn it, every cent."

And at this point in the conversation the street door was opened, and Flossie, passing long enough to say, "In the hall sho I am," hurried off to the kitchen.

After this first encounter the young girl saw every little of Norman, but when he happened to meet her he always spoke kindly and respectfully to her. He had not been at home for a long time, so his mother and stepfather were very glad to have him with them again. It was evident to Flossie that he had kept her secret, for Mrs. Copeland treated her in the usual manner.

Norman was a great favorite in the town. A number of parties were given in his honor, and soon he was involved in a constant round of gayety.

Never had Flossie's week been so distasteful to her as it now was. The days seemed so long that they would never drag their weary length along, and her tears would fall from her at the dainty dishes which she concocted to please Norman's fastidious appetite.

One night there is to be a grand ball at the house of one of the leaders of fashion, and, of course, the Copelands are invited.

At the proper time Norman starts for the ball-room with his parents, but, on the plea of having forgotten something, returns to the house.

Going straight to the kitchen, he finds Flossie seated on a low chair, paring apples. As her back is turned to the door, she does not observe his quiet entrance. Making stealthily up behind her, he places both hands over her eyes and cries, "Who is it?"

"I should say it was Mr. Norman Erlington," answers Flossie, as he takes away his hands, and seats himself beside her.

"Why didn't you go to the ball?" she demands.

"Because I would rather stay with you."

"Well, then, make yourself useful as well as ornamental," at the same time giving him a knife and an apple.

"Why didn't you ever answer my letter?" he asked, after a silence of several minutes.

"Because I never received any to answer."

"That is strange. I most certainly wrote."

"If you did write, the letter must have been lost."

"Did you think I had forgotten you?" asked Norman. "No, indeed, Flossie; I couldn't do that, for, you see, I love you."

And then, before she was aware of it, Flossie found herself lying in Norman's breast and his arms encircling her, while he showered passionate kisses upon lips, cheek, and brow.

"I loved you all the time, Flossie, but when I came home and found you here, I thought I would wait and see if you had improved enough to go on with your chosen work in spite of what any one might think or say. I did that you have, for I'm glad of it, darling. I love you so dearly! Can you love me just a little?"

"I do love you now," whispered his pretty prisoner, lifting a shy, blushing face to him.

In the morning the whole story was told to Mrs. Copeland. Though greatly surprised, and at first displeased, she soon became reconciled. The next day Norman accompanied Flossie home, and obtained her father's consent to their speedy union. So a month later, when Ida returned, Flossie Templeton became Mrs. Norman Erlington.

Gas-Pipes Made from Paper.

A novel use of paper has been found in the manufacture of gas-pipes. It is constructed as follows: An endless strip of hemp paper, one width of which equals the length of the tube, is passed through a bath of melted asphalt, and then rolled tightly and smoothly on a core to give the required diameter. When the number of layers rolled is sufficient to afford the desired thickness, the tube is strongly compressed, the outside sprinkled with lime sand, and the whole cooled in water. When cold, the core is drawn out and the interior served with a water-proofing composition. In addition to being absolutely light and durable, it is cheaper than iron, these pipes are of great density, for when the older have several thicknesses of an inch thick, they will stand a pressure of more than fifteen atmospheres. If buried underground, they will not be broken by settlement, nor when violently shaken or jarred. The material being a bad conductor of heat, the pipes do not readily freeze.

A Famished Boy.

Tommy Waltersporon, whose father is famous for his kindness to every neighbor in neighbor.

"Now, Tommy, just do as if you were at home," said the lady of the house.

"What are you crying about?"

"If I do just as if I was at home, I dose not eat half as much as I want ter. Boo-hoo!" said the poor boy.

The lady then told him to eat just as if he was not at home, and, with a bright smile on his open face, Tommy gave him a bowl of soup, a plate of roast beef, and a generous slice of pie.

STUB ALLEN.

Ever since he could remember he had been called Stub, although that was not his true name. But it was appropriate, and for that reason it had clung to him.

He was scarcely taller than a well-grown boy of ten, while his shoulders were broad, and his face wrinkled like that of an old man. Strangers were curious in regard to him, and he he was employed at a railroad depot his story was often told.

It was all because of tobacco that he was so short. He began to smoke when he was only three years old, and continued the habit until he was nearly thirty. Then he determined to give up tobacco. It cost him a terrible effort to do this; yet he persevered, although his nerves were so shaken that for weeks he could not trust him self to take a cup of coffee in his hand.

His father, from whom he inherited the appetite, was an inveterate smoker, and when he begged to be allowed to smoke a pipe was given to him. After that he smoked at home occasionally, and when away the novelty of seeing such a child puffing at a pipe or cigar led thoughtless men and boys to tempt him to make an exhibition of his folly.

"Allow a boy of mine to smoke!" he exclaimed, when this question was asked him. "Never! I have suffered enough for a whole family. There is not a day of my life when I am not mortified at being such a stub. If my boy doesn't grow up in good shape, it shall not be because they use tobacco while they live with me. They say they ain't ashamed of me, but I think I can trust them for not wanting to look like me. Why, I looked as old as I do now when I was twenty-five, and I smoked until I was nearly thirty."

"What made you stop?"

"Because I must stop or die. I had a touch of the horrors, delirium tremens, brought on by tobacco instead of liquor. Once was enough for me; and besides, the doctors told me my chances for life were about over. I quit then, but money wouldn't hire me to go through what I did the next six months. Sometimes now, when I smell a good cigar, I am half crazy for it, but nothing would tempt me to take a single smoke. If I did, it would be all up with me.

"I didn't marry until I was clear of all that, and my wife thinks as I do about our boys. They are taller now than I am, with a prospect of growing right along. They are good scholars, and I calculate to send them through college if they let smoking and drinking alone. When they begin with tobacco and liquors I have done spending money for them.

"I never cared for liquor, although I wonder I didn't; but I tell you the way to have good men is to be sure of the boys. I don't want any more stubs around where I am, and I don't mean to have them if I can prevent it."

William Cannon, Fenton, Gratiot county, Mich., says: "I think it is the best paper I take."

L. A. Welch, Sullivan, O., says: "It is better than many of the 42 papers I take."

Mrs. Dr. Lucas, Fort Wayne, Ind., says: "I would not do without it for double the price if I could not get it otherwise."

Clifford P. Foster, Woodhull, Henry County, Ill., says: "It is one of the three papers I take."

W. W. Rhodes, Adrian, Mich., says: "I don't know how I could do without it. It is the best paper I take, and I take many."

Peter Lansing, Canton, Dundee County, Mich., says: "I take Tom Taylor's Weekly, Harper's Weekly and Weekly Times, and consider the Chicago Weekly News worth all the money I pay for it, because it is fully equal to any of them, and cheaper than any other weekly."

H. B. Davenport, Farmers, N. Y., says: "It is the richest 'bit' in the four pages I get."

Mrs. L. Kinney, Hamilton, Mo., says: "I'm delighted with your paper. I don't see how you can take them at such a low price."

W. D. Law, Mansfield, Tex., says: "I get many papers, but yours is the best for the price of any I take. I like it better than some papers that cost me three times as much, on account of the question fairness and justice, which I find very rare when I get a money paper at half or other rates."

WALL STREET'S FUTURE.

The Coming Man of the Stock Market—Jay Gould's Heir and the Young Vanderbilts.

They are saying down in Wall street that the old gang will not get back into power, but that in the forthcoming moves new operators will be developed. One of the coming men in New York financial circles is S. V. White, broker, lawyer and deacon in Mr. Beecher's Plymouth Church. He is a youngster yet, but he is a promising one, and moreover he has captured Jay Gould's heart. Any person who could carry to so successful an issue such a speculation as White engineered in his celebrated Lackawanna deal may be sure of Gould's appreciation and admiration if he seeks it. White was originally a lawyer, but progress up the legal ladder of fame was too slow, and when the young man saw in the flush times of 1880 that many of his broker friends were making $250 or $380 a day six days in the week, he put his money in a Stock Exchange seat, and bought and sold stocks for a living. He had already some few thousands of dollars and he had by his brightness attracted the attention of Beecher of Plymouth Church, whose aid and influence were gladly given to him. It takes a nimble mind to get along in Wall street, but White was not behind the quickest. He soon had an office full of customers, and they began to put up jobs on the street, almost all of which it must be said in truth were successful. Gould caught sight of White's brilliant work, sent for him, and offered him business.

When Gould takes a liking to a man that man's fortune is made, provided he has brains enough to live up to his privileges. Frank Work and Charles Osborne, and Morrisel, Connor, Russell Sage and a host of others owe quite as much to Gould as to themselves for their Wall street success. White took the hint and he and Gould got along very nicely together. White was made the general of the Lackawanna deal. He made for himself $250,000 by twisting the shorts on the list of last March, and half as much more by selling the stock short on the reaction that followed. Then the same deal was repeated with the same result, but the end was not until the last of the year 1884, and then the young operator cleaned up and found himself $2,000,000 better off through the fluctuations in Lackawanna than he had been a year before. In other stocks he had made $1,000,000 more. Gould, who had known of his plans and had been in the pool with him, also reaped substantial profits.

White is now one of the foremost men in the street. Five years ago he was comparatively unknown. He is worth between $4,000,000 and $5,000,000, and is splendidly equipped to take advantage of the many chances that must come with the revival of good times. Not a banker or broker but counts his friendships and good will and is willing to lend him money or go into a deal with him. He is one of the few who, at the ebb of hard times, finds himself better off than at the beginning of them and who has abundant capital and credit with which to profit by the approaching prosperity. There are the men who are in the next ten years to develop into the richest men in America. It is upbill work for the bears, the Villards, the Keenes, the Garrisons and the plucked Wall street men to even get back what they have lost, but the men who have weathered the gale are still in possession of snug bank accounts—who have a million or more with which to build—they are the ones who will count their possessions by the scores of millions ten or twelve years hence. White is one. Frank Work is another. Worrell Roe is a third, and so they go. They are not more than half a score of them, all told, but they will be an important figure in the Nation's financial history if things go well with them.

There is diversity of opinion as to whether young George Gould will keep the Gould possessions together, or not. Thus far he has not fulfilled all the fond desires of his distinguished parent. He has not much of a head for finance, or a surplus of aptitude for speculation. To be a good speculator requires much sagacity. He enjoys the theaters very well, and likes to slip in behind the scenes among the pretty chorus or ballet girls, and his broad aches quite frequently next day during business hours. Nevertheless Mr. Gould is making every effort to make a helpless man of him, and he ought to succeed. A good teacher may sometimes brighten up a dull student. Gould has two more boys in reserve, however, and when they are old enough they may be trained out in place of their elder brother. The Vanderbilt boys are even less promising than the Gould stock, and no one doubts that the Vanderbilt fortune will be blown to the four winds if he-ven ever a score of years has rolled by.

Miss Guelph's Cheap Princeling.

The portrait of Princess Beatrice of England, the youngest daughter of the Queen, represents her as a comely and sensible woman. She will be twenty-eight years old on the 14th of next April, and is thus much nearer an old maid's estate than Princesses usually come. The youth selected for her husband, Prince Henry of Battenberg, is a third of a "poor relation" of the Emperor of Germany. The radical press of London calls him a Dutch pauper, but from that harsh remark it need not be supposed that he is ragged or particularly hungry. He is simply winded out a job, and, as Kings and Princes cannot rob folks nowadays without being arrested like any other man, he is without visible means of support. When Pince Henry, who is a toothsome creature with decayed teeth and bad breath, has married Miss Guelph he will be in very comfortable circumstances. Parliament will give her $150,000 outright and an annuity of $30,000. If Henry cannot purchase all the sausage, beer, cheese, kraut and some wine that he wants with this allowance, it may be that his mother-in-law will help him out. Princess Beatrice has been in love many times. She first loved a tutor who belonged to the common herd. Then she was smitten with the Prince Imperial of France, also out of a job. Following this she doted some on her old reputate of a brother-in-law, Prince Louis of Hesse, a widower. From him it was but a step to the despised Battenberg princeling. Royalty must be in a pretty hard row of stumps in England when the youngest, best looking, smartest and most amiable daughter of the Queen can find no husband but a half-baked little princeling remotely connected with the royal family of Germany. But this is the penance which Beatrice must pay for being the youngest. There are not first-class Princes enough to go around.—Chicago Herald.

Lancashire Lassies.

The lady superintendent of a hospital in one of our Lancashire towns where the distinctive characteristics of the people come out even more broadly than usual, told us that at first she hardly knew what to make of such a state of things, and was almost afraid to venture out of doors, for she could neither understand the speech of the people nor make herself understood by them. Being a gentlewoman in every sense of the word and possessed of much tact, with a strong reserve of common sense, she soon became a great favorite with the rough men and women by whom she was surrounded, but could never get over the sense of amusement at being now and then stopped in the streets by a knot of mill girls—all perfect strangers to her and she to them—and told that she had on a very pretty gown and they would like to know where it was made. "In London," she usually had to answer; and would further gratify their curiosity by telling them to take a good look at it, so that they might not forget the way in which it was made. To have felt, or at any rate shown, sunnyness would have been the height of absurdity, as the girls really intended to be complimentary. There was a story told of two ladies—one an American—who, when walking along one day, heard the comments which were freely passed upon their apparance and attire; some bright buttons which the American lady had on her coat being a very famous fancy of attraction, and particularly taking the mill girls' fancy. Foolishly enough the lady turned round and soundly rated them, with the very unpleasant consequence that she and her companion were followed and hooted at by an ever-increasing crowd of men, women, and children, so that they had at length to take refuge in the police station, which by good fortune chanced to be close at hand. In this case, too, no rudeness had been intended; the girls themselves would have felt pleased for any one to remark upon their clothes, and they could not imagine that for them to do so would be disagreeable to others.—Chatauber's Journal.

Soup for Dinner.

No doubt, in many families, the prejudice against soup has arisen from the fact that it is usually prepared and served in large quantities, instead of, as at the tables of the rich, in small portions, though many kinds would furnish in themselves a substantial meal for a growing child. At any rate, the advantages of commencing dinner with soup are manifest in the saving of the meat bills, and economy practised in utilizing scraps of all kinds for the making of the soups, and the comfortable sensation experienced after a little has been taken, for let any person who feels, as the saying goes, "too hungry to eat," swallow a few spoonfuls of soup, and the feeling of exhaustion will quickly pass away. Indeed, a well-known authority has said that nothing tends more to restore the tone of the stomach and invite easy digestion than a little soup.—Cassell's Magazine.

Anti-Woman's Rights Fable.

A bear once fell in love with a Setting Hen, and told her some day that she might go to a picnic and he would hatch out her eggs for her. She consented, and the gallant Bear took his position on the nest in the regulation manner, but soon got up, looking as if he had been resting in a bowl of egg-nog as a substitute for an arm-chair. "The next Hen I fall in love with must do her own hatching," he remarked to himself in great disgust, as he took his melancholy departure. "I hatched out the eggs at the very first clutter, but there are no chickens in them." Moral: This fable teaches that some duties pertaining to the domestic economy are too subtle and mysterious to be brilliantly discharged by the Lords of Creation.

THE DYING SOLDIER.

Gen. Grant's Obstinate Battle with Death.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 4th.

Visitors to the city of the morning of the 4th inst. report that Gen. Grant had passed a very comfortable night. The weather was favorable to an easy condition, but he had been for generally two previous nights, the 4th and 5th, quite uncomfortable. In the forenoon of yesterday he enjoyed the usual warmth of the weather, sitting at his window, and remarked that the change was very pleasant. A slight change took place in consultation in the afternoon, and after a thorough examination of the lungs, it was agreed that the local conditions were improved. The treatment of the past few days was continued, but no let or hindrance from the house in Dr. Shrady's judgment the tumors grew no stronger, and the general condition of the patient was in no worse condition than he had been for generally previous nights, the 4th and 5th he nourishment regularly

CHARLEVOIX, - - MICHIGAN.

In view of the effort to concentrate a few more manufacturing enterprises in Charlevoix, there is one thing to which we wish to call attention. One year ago the newspapers of this town advertised our resources and advantages to a very large and liberal extent, and on the opening of navigation there were numerous calls for business places. One man wanted to put in a stock of fancy goods, but could find no suitable salesroom, and besides was told that he would not be encouraged to go into competition with the ladies who were already engaged in that trade. Another man wanted to embark in the dry goods business, but could not get suitable rooms and went elsewhere. Another wanted a water front to engage in the manufacture of wooden bowls, and made a partial agreement for a site, but while at dinner the owner of the lot concluded that if the man really meant business the lot was worth at least five hundred dollars more than he first asked. The buyer did not raise, and we are informed he afterwards found a good site and located at Mancelona. A gentleman from Charlotte looked over this county, desiring to manufacture agricultural implements, using both our iron and hardwood lumber, but could not see the money in the water fronts that was asked, and located elsewhere. No doubt a dozen other similar cases can be recalled (we personally know of several more) where men who wanted to locate here were turned away either by high prices of property or were discouraged by rivals in business. Now if our people are able to dictate who shall and who shall not locate here, it is All right,—perhaps. We have frequently observed that really progressive towns encourage everything that wants to come. Like a Jew clothier, sell a site at some price before the customer leaves town. Charlevoix must make up her mind to do just that thing before she progresses. The dead-lock in property must be broken.

The Official Count.

As a matter of record we this week insert our figures on the county seat removal and state officers. It will be seen that there are no important changes from those first published. In Eveline and Norwood the figures on county seat were in some manner overlooked by the canvassers, and those here given are unofficial, as furnished by our correspondents.

For state officers Charlevoix cast three votes for the prohibition ticket. Morse's majority in the county is 416, while the republican regents have majorities of 94 and 95 respectively. In Chandler there were no democratic or national tickets at the polls, possibly through some misunderstanding between the two committees of distribution, but some good work was done for Morse with slips.

A Democratic Victory.

At time of going to press last week, we had no returns from the state, and the local returns were not such as to indicate the election of the democratic regents, therefore we said that the apparent election of Morse for supreme judge was not a democratic victory, in a political sense. But the later returns, showing the election of Morse by over 35,000, and the democratic regents by not far from 20,000, makes it indeed a democratic victory with an old-time republican majority. It is a democratic victory of which we all as a party may feel proud, and which, without any doubt has "come to stay."

Notice To Wage-Workers.

The Michigan Bureau of Labor and Industrial Statistics is conducting an extended inquiry into the condition, wants, and prospects of the wage-workers of this State. An invitation is given to all employes, male or female, over 18 years of age, who are desirous of, or willing to answer the questions prepared by the Bureau, to send their address, plainly written on a postal card, to the Commissioner of Labor at Lansing, Michigan.

Blanks containing questions special, ly prepared, with a view to securing from wage-workers reliable information bearing upon the subject of labor in which they are personally interested, will be sent to each address, together with stamped envelope for returning the blanks when filled out, to the Bureau.

By giving these questions prompt and candid attention, with full and free answers, a valuable service will be rendered to the wage-workers of Michigan and to the State. No names given to the Bureau will be made public, but held in strict confidence.

Political Paragraphs.

Queen Victoria, herself an invalid at Aix-les-Bains, graciously inquires by telegraph after the condition of Gen. Grant.

The impudent boast that "anybody can carry Michigan for the republican ticket" has been repudiated with an emphasis which carries complete assurance against any repetitions.—Detroit Free Press.

Under the heading, "Wanted a Leader," the Detroit Evening News pays a glowing tribute to Zack Chandler, whose leadership carried the republican party to success, and whose death marked the beginning of the downfall of the party.

According to the good old republican way of expressing the thing, Michigan is "loyal." Grand old Michigan! The government at Washington is democratic, and Michigan is democratic. What greater proof of Michigan's loyalty could be desired?—Chicago Herald.

Only a day or two ago the Russians were planting torpedoes at Cronstadt and Odessa. If war is inevitable the British Navy cannot proceed to pay its respects to the great Russian seaports too soon. And the sooner they are closed the better the price of American wheat.—[N. Y. World.

Historical Society.

On Tuesday evening, April 14, at the residence of Mr. and Mrs. L. E. Allen, a large number of members and friends of the society were present and a very interesting program arranged.

Society was called to order by the president, and the evening's exercises opened with a duet by Messrs. Bradbeer and Carleton; Paper by Robert Miller both instructive and interesting; school reading Winnie Rattlesdown; music, quartette, Bradbeer, Carleton, Mrs. Hines and Mrs. Clark; reading by Mrs. Bartholomew with piano accompaniment by Miss Cochran; recitation, Miss Marion Dupont; instrumental solo, Miss Cochran; recitation Miss Maud Lovejoy.

The society after the regular order of business adjourned for two weeks to meet at the parlors of the Bridge Street House, for the closing banquet of the season, to which all members and their friends are invited Tuesday eve., April 28.

F. A. SMITH, Secretary.

To the Citizens of Charlevoix and Vicinity.

All those interested in the welfare and prosperity of the village, and who favor a movement to induce parties in this locality with capital for manufacturing purposes or otherwise develop the resources of said village and vicinity, will meet at the Village Hall in said village, on Saturday, April 10th, at 7 o'clock p. m., to discuss and solve the best means and ways to secure the same.

From Beaver Island.

Spring is very late in its approach, though recent heavy rains have taken off most of the snow. The ice in the lake is as solid as ever.

John Hoy, Jr., left here on the 8th with three teams loaded with fresh fish, bound for Harbor Springs. He expects to bring back full loads of merchandise.

Mackinaw county has been represented as being republican in politics, but a glance at the election returns of last Monday will show something different. The town of Chandler polled a democratic and a republican vote. The officers elected are:

Supervisor—Fred Rinn.
Clerk—Wm. J. Gallagher.
Treasurer—William Gibson.
Justice—James Moore.
School Inspectors—James Gibson and Wm. J. Gallagher.

The town of Pulaw polled 88 democratic and 8 republican votes. The officers elected are:

Supervisor—Anthony O'Donnell.
Clerk—Francis Dunlevy.
Treasurer—P. D. Gallagher.
School Inspector—Hernia Cull.
Highway Commissioner—Wm. Gallagher.

Things were warm all day in this town.

The town of Galliee will have at least thirty democratic votes. James E. McCauley was re-elected Supervisor, Dominic Gallagher, Clerk, and V. McIntosh, Treasurer.

We are anxious to see the boats running again and our Chemos are busily engaged in getting ready for them.

Bay Springs.

We are all longing for a glimpse of earth once more.

Baby girls have arrived at the homes of John Dunsmoor and C. W. Smith.

The workmen in the Boss mill struck for higher wages last week, but returned to work at former prices, with the understanding that their wages were to be increased soon.

H. R. Chapman managed to get to Horton's Bay to vote on election day, but it was a severe undertaking.

The friends of Mr. and Mrs. Robert Brace gave them a pleasant "April fool" surprise on the 1st.

The Bobe factory is saving hard wood lumber and is doing a lively business. Twelve workmen are now employed. They will soon begin to saw spindles.

Letters from the People.

EDITOR JOURNAL:—How do you suppose that father felt on the reply he got from Rev. C. P. Van Ankes, to which he referred in his address and Sunday sermon? Did father think "I can drink or let it alone; but there is my son, a young man, who can't let it alone; he must get drunk." The idea presented by the Elder, that the sin inherited by humanity in relation to strong drink, is only too true. May every one study this eternal physical law of nature; the transmission of inclinations. ALPHA.

Sermon

At the M. E. Church next Sabbath at 10:30 o'clock by the pastor. Subject: "The Reason and Philosophy of Dedication." This discourse will enter the domain of practical discussion. HEATHE—HUME—On April 8th, 1885, at the residence of the bride's parents in Maple City, Leelanau county, by Rev. C. W. Williams, Mr. Arthur Heathe, of Charlevoix, and Miss Lizzie Hulme, of Maple City.

The young couple will settle at once on Mr. Heathe's farm near Charlevoix. The JOURNAL extends congratulations.

STEVENS—THOMPSON—On April 14th, at the Methodist parsonage, by Rev. J. T. Iddings, Capt. Hiram Stevens and Mrs. Effie Thompson, both of Charlevoix.

When Capt. Stevens came here with the tug Martin one year ago, he said he had come to stay, and now he has still further cemented the ties by making a home to keep him here. Mrs. Thompson is well known as a daughter of Capt. T. D. Smith, one of the pioneers of Charlevoix.

MISS L. SPAULDING.

STATE OF MICHIGAN—Thirteenth Judicial Circuit in Chancery. Melissa E. Keller, complainant, vs. Simeon R. Keller, defendant. Suit pending in the Circuit Court for the county of Charlevoix, in chancery, at the city of Charlevoix, on the 6th day of March, A. D. 1885. In this cause it appearing from affidavit on file that the defendant, Simeon R. Keller, is not a resident of this state, and that his whereabouts are unknown, and that process for his appearance has been duly issued and that the same could not be served on said defendant, by reason of his absence from the state, on motion of L. L. Corbett, solicitor for complainant, it is ordered that defendant appear his appearance in said cause on or before five months from date of this order, and that within twenty days the complainant cause this order to be published in the Charlevoix Journal, a newspaper printed and circulating in said county, and publication to be continued therein, once in each week, for six weeks in succession.

☞ E. M. Clark wants forty men to cut shipping wood, and furnace wood.

A full line of cotton goods, sheetings, pillow case cottons, crash and towels, now open at U. E. & Co's.

☞ A postal card to C. J. Strang, of Dowagiac, Mich., brings you his poultry circular, which it will pay you to read.

The Lansing Sunday Siftings, has changed hands cut off a large portion of the name and now stands as The Sun, is very much improved in typographical appearance, and is now a very respectable city newspaper. Our old friend "Jack" Stephenson, a veteran printer and newspaper man, for a long time proof reader in the state printing office, is one of the new firm.

"The Herald has already noted the fact that H. B. Chapman had offered the "Tourists' Home," at Bay Springs" to the state, for a reasonable sum, for the proposed soldiers' and sailors' home. This house is a large and handsome new hotel, costing the proprietor away up into the tens of thousands of dollars, and it is, we understand, admirably adapted for the purposes of such an institution as the state talks of establishing. It is well located, on one of the most beautiful lakes in the state, in a healthy locality, and the Herald would be glad to see this selection made."—[Traverse Herald.

There are a few chronic gossips in town who seem to have no pleasure except when retailing a scandalous story about some neighbor, and they have succeeded in keeping society in a ferment and petty jealous warfare for months. One of the best things that could happen to the town would be a stroke of lightning, or paralysis, or something of that sort, to every person who will repeat a scandal. It has been said, and sometimes we think justly, that the gossip and scandal monger, is the vilest moral leper in community, the worst enemy to society and the church, and far more dangerous to the rising generation than the worst slums and dives along our streets.

"A thing of beauty is a joy forever." This will apply forcibly to the tourists guide book of the G. R. & I. R. R. for 1885. Mechanically, the work is gotten up in the most modern style of the printers art, and is embellished with new and accurate illustrations reproduced by photography from actual scenes. Two full-page scenes of Charlevoix are given,—one looking west from the top of the Chicago club house, showing the whole of Round lake, with all the docks and business houses; the other looking northeast from the highest point of the terrace of the Charlevoix resort, and showing the Belvidere house and all the cottages on and near Breezy Point with the Chicago resort in the distance. The work is accompanied with a folder describing briefly the chief points of interest in northern Michigan, and time tables showing how to reach there in the easiest manner.

DANGER.

Do you know that you are liable to attacks of dyspepsia and all kinds of stomach derangements? Yes, worse still, to the result of kidney and liver disorder that is known as diabetes or possibly bright's disease. They are often fatal and that in a very short time. Loss of appetite, sour stomach, dimness of vision, dizziness, pains in side and back and many others are but the symptoms of disease. Be wise in time. Parmelee's Dyspepsia, Diabetes, Kidney and Liver Cure is the sovereign remedy. Large bottles $1.00.

COUGHS AND COLDS

Are the inevitable results of sudden changes in the weather. Immediate attention should be given them so that they may not become established and result in bronchitis, congestion, inflammation or even consumption. Hamilton's Cough Balsam soothes the irritated membranes and assists in removing phlegm and mucus, that, by its adhesion to the membranes, causes violent coughing. Great relief is received by even those in the last stages of consumption. In croup and whooping cough it is unequaled. Price 25 and 50 cents per bottle.

SCIENTIFIC INVESTIGATION

Has proved that nothing but a direct application can cure the many forms of piles, that so trouble all classes of mankind. In all forms of piles, immediate and careful attention is needed. By faithfully following the direction given with each box of Parmelee's Pile Suppositories a cure is certain. Warranted to give immediate relief. Price 50c per box.

IN THE SPRING

Nature intends that the human body should be relieved of the heavy, stagnant humors which always accumulate during the winter months, and the very best medicines for accomplishing this object is Parmelee's Blood Purifier. It will cleanse and purify the system and drive out all humors and impurity safely and quickly. Price $1.00 for large bottles.

☞ Now is the time your horses and cattle need attention. To prevent disease and tone up the system you will find Parmelee's Condition Powders unexcelled. Full pounds 35 cents.

All the above medicines sold by Dr. G. W. Cramer, Charlevoix, and Cameron & Hayes, druggists, at Boyne. 9040

The Mancelona Herald has invested its surplus earnings of the winter in a nice new office building and will move about May 1st.

Mr. J. A. Mitchell arrived on Tuesday to look after the government work, which was begun by Mr. Allen on Wednesday.

Charles Ely has contracted to supply all the street car lines of Fort City and both the Saginaws with Smith's patent cuspidor.

While down in Eli Toulouse's well on Tuesday, Dan. Rhodes was hit by a falling plank, and injured on the head and shoulder.

Capt. Tullock is rebuilding the cabin of the schr. P. M. Smith, moving it further aft, and extending sideways the full width of the boat.

Mrs. M. DePue has decided to return to Charlevoix, and will be found at her old place in the millinery department with Miss Spaulding.

It is announced that Mr. Will E. Hampton and Miss Jennie Lathrop, both of the Harbor Springs Independent, were married last Wednesday.

Alden Chamberlin's large Percheron stallion, Young French Joe, died Tuesday night. A post mortem examination revealed strong evidences of poisoning.

Ed. Parmelee has been to Lansing this week looking for sailors,—we presume that was his errand, as it is asserted that he went to see some but tars.

It is hard to find a more accommodating official than Sam. Thatcher, county clerk, and it is a busy day when he can't find time to wait on everybody in a satisfactory manner.

The numerous black eyes about town are no indication of a disposition to fight at every chance, but are evidence that good use is made of the boxing gloves recently purchased.

The tug Higgie is receiving extensive repairs to her boiler and machinery, her decks are to be raised, and a cabin put in below. The work is being done at Campbell's yard.

At the last meeting of Baxter post, G. A. R., resolutions of sympathy with the sufferings of Gen. U. S. Grant, were passed, and a copy forwarded to the family of the dying commander.

Charlevoix business men are moving in the matter of a local organization for the purpose of inducing manufacturing enterprises and otherwise developing the resources of the place.—[Tradesman.

The "Blue and Gray" will be presented at Petoskey by the G. A. R. of that place, on April 23d, 24th and 25th, and an invitation has been extended to Baxter post and friends in Charlevoix to be present.

Hannah, Lay & Co's Traverse City Mills are to be changed to the roller process, with seven double sets of rollers. The mill will have a capacity of 150 barrels a day and no custom grinding will be done after April 18th.

Arrangements are perfected for the extension of the telephone from Charlevoix to Boyne via East Jordan as fast as the work can be pushed this spring. All the necessary stock is subscribed, and the contract for poles is let.

Last Sunday evening the people of Charlevoix were treated to a masterly discourse on the evils of intemperance, by Rev. C. P. Van Anken, of the Congregational church. More of the same kind would be appreciated, and productive of good results.

Cooper & Cooper have just received a number of fine furniture catalogues, by the aid of which the customer can make selections of the best and richest goods without their being carried in stock. This better enables the firm to compete with larger houses.

We are still of the opinion, Mr. Record, notwithstanding your long-winded arguments (?), that your criticism of the canuata trouve was numerically severe. It is not a falsehood, as intimated, that Charlevoix people feel insulted, though certain "members of the company" may have made more severe criticisms in the editor's presence. However, this feature is too delicate to discuss here where the history of the organization and its success is so well known. The persistence with which this criticism is followed is but another instance of the disposition on the part of Petoskey papers to belittle everything from Charlevoix regardless of its merits.

L. Wilckhud has made and sold quite a number of maps of Charlevoix county, and plats of Charlevoix village; and is now engaged on a set of plats of all the villages in the county, which, when completed, will make a valuable addition to any office that secures them.

The ladies of the Congregational society gave another of their excellent socials at the church last evening, the refreshments being warm sugar and biscuit. An interesting musical program was provided, including also a recitation by Mrs. Harsha, which was heartily applauded.

"One of the teachers in this district walks 700 miles during the three terms she teaches. Four miles a day."—Ex. Pretty good for a woman. C. B. Ghee, of Charlevoix, walked eight miles a day during his three months term just closed, a total of 529 miles, and some of the time was most persistent cold weather.

It has been often been announced in these columns that G. W. Cromter was building a drug store at Ironton. The building is now completed, the first shipment of stock put in, and business nicely started. It will be under the immediate supervision of Mr. J. M. Harris, who has also an interest, the firm being known as Cromter & Harris. The location is a good one, and we have no doubt the venture will be successful in all respects.

L. D. Bartholomew returned home Tuesday. He reports the season in the south four to six weeks late; that in Alabama they are just plowing for cotton, which it should have been planted a month ago; and that in Cincinnati he experienced a nasty, disagreeable snow storm,—as bad or worse than we have here. Perhaps, after all, those who think of moving away from here on account of the long cold winter will not gain much.

☞ The county seat question of Charlevoix county was settled by ballot in Monday's election, the majority of the voters deciding to remove the county seat from Charlevoix, the beautiful little village in the north-western part of the county, to East Jordan, located near the southern line. An elegant building was completed at Charlevoix last fall for the county offices, and now some $50,000 will have to be expended in the erection of a suitable building at East Jordan.—Saginaw Courier.

The Grand Rapids Democrat is progressing, surely. Some time ago it tried to get possession of the plans for the proposed new city hall for the purpose of reproducing them in the paper, but was refused. A few days later the "official" design was exhibited in a show window and a "special artist" was employed by the paper to make a camera in front of that window for a very brief time. The photograph so obtained was then sent to a photo-engraving house in Chicago, and the cut returned in time to be printed in the issue of the paper announcing the acceptance of the designs and the letting of the contract. This is real enterprise.

Chas. S. Hampton, in the last Independent, discusses the proposed soldier's home, and thinks he sees a job in it for the benefit of Lansing or some city in the southern part of the state. He says that a better and more practicable plan than the one proposed (would he to accept the proposition of H. B. Chapman, of Bay Springs, to sell the State his big hotel, the "Tourists Home," together with the land for a soldiers' home. The location is pleasant and healthful, and is easily accessable. As a hotel it is a failure, and the owner would be glad to sell for $25,000, which is $10,000 less than it cost. The building is well calculated for the purpose, and an expense of two or three thousand dollars would fit it already for occupancy in 30 days, whereas such a building as the ring are after could not be ready in less than two or three years. An appropriation of from fifty to seventy-five thousand dollars would be enough to purchase, fit up and maintain this place as a soldiers' home for two years, and if the State must provide a home we do not think there is any other place so economical and feasible."

Chas. Ely, who is traveling in the interest of Smith's patent railroad cuspidor, has just sent in an order for 25 to be used by the F. & P. M. R. R. This is the first order from a railroad, but over 60 have been sold for hotels and saloons, and the work has hardly begun. There is evidently a bonanza in this thing for the inventor and owners.

SPINNING.

Like a blind spinner in the sun,
I tread my day;
I know that all the threads will run
Into one web, by-and-by.
I know not how I will bring its task,
And, being blind, we never ask.

I do not know the use or name
Of that I spin;
I only know I became one came,
And bid spin!
My hand the thread, and said: "Slave you
Are blind but one thing you can do."

Sometimes the clouds so rough and fast
Are tangled by,
I know the storm and the sweeping past,
And fear that I
Shall fall, but dare not leap to find
A safer place, since I am blind.

I know not why, but I am sure
That that blind place
In space and time I am to endure
Past time and place—
My threads will have; so from the first,
I sings blind, I never feel accursed.

I think, perhaps, this trust has spread
From—I am sure of it—
Such as I am, I am not the young—
So young, I trust
It, knowing not that God's name signed
My brow, and sealed me His, though blind.

But whether this be real or sign
Within, without,
It matters not. I am fated divine
Past time and place—
I know I have no love, and will,
And shall, and blind, I will fill will!

But listen, listen, day by day,
To hear them tread
Who hear the hundred ends away,
And out the thread,
And bend their ears to measure in the sum,
Their pace behind spinner, work is done."

DOUX SOUVENIR.

The room was one of those harmonious little lowers seen in these eclectic days. Nora had fallen in love with the description of a violet boudoir, and when her taste was consulted about her own boudoir she unhesitatingly declared it should be hung and furnished in slashes of purple from the deepest to the palest, and it was done.

In this afternoon her own dress harmonized with the room. Violet silk and velvet trimmed over the purple carpet, and a band of sparkling amethyst violets bound her golden hair. Even the air was laden with faint fragrance of the fresh flowers.

Nora was seated at the piano playing, while Philip Leighton leaned his face and head against the dark damask of an easy chair, and listened with half-closed eyes. His violin lay lovingly against his heart, and in a long, slender "violin hand" still mechanically held its bow.

"Play No. 1 of the Lieder," he said, as she paused a moment in a faint, inspiring chord; "the one which they call 'Doux Souvenir.'"

She shivered slightly, and opened her lips to refuse, then resolutely turned, as she began to play. Philip's eyes were open now, and he watched her closely, as, with tight-shut mouth and set, strained eyes, she played it through with rare feeling, but evident pain, like a flash, there passed through his mind the thought of a cried wind drive by before it two forms with faces hidden. As the last note died away Nora rose so pale and was that Philip started to his feet, looking at her in surprise; but almost instantly her color returned, and she laughed lightly.

"I once cried," he said, quietly, as he executed himself in his purple chair, "a very strange story about ever one having a key-note. A certain note in the scale dominated over them in some mysterious fashion, and every one who discovered this possessed a singular power over the person who responded to it. The story pretended that this was universal. I think it fanciful myself, though I have tried to prove it. I am certain, however, that I have found a number of sounds which have a strange effect upon you, Nora. Why do you never play that piece without extreme pain?"

Again a slight shudder passed over her, but after a moment's hesitation she replied:

"I don't know. That it is so true, and although I am unconscious of changing color, I know that, too, is so. Yet, after playing it, people have sometimes come up and offered me a fan or smagrette, as if they thought me faint."

"What does it make you think of?" he asked.

"Of the wind. Whenever named it 'Doux Souvenir' must have had different ears from mine. It also makes me think of or see a picture.

"Unpresenting—

"Two shadowy figures driven by the wind. Such sad, sad looks they turn one to the other; but sadness full of longing, lingering love."

This time he, too, turned pale. He rose.

"My dear Nora," he said, "this is growing absurd. Absolutely, I begin myself to shiver. Come, accompany me; let us play it together."

Complying at once, she went to the piano. Once or twice she raised her eyes to his face bewildingly, as if imploring him to stop; but he was mercilessly determined to fight away this "something," and he held her to the very last. Softly, faintly, the murmuring wind-sounds died away, until they blended into silence; but as he turned to circle her playfully, her eyes looked dimly into his, then closed as she fainted in his arms.

Neither had noticed her father, who, drawn by the music, had been standing in the curtained doorway. He hurried in as his daughter fell, and, taking her somewhat abruptly from Philip's arms, said a word to him, and the young man retired. A moment after, Nora opened her eyes in vague wonder, and, seeing her father's face a old recall nothing of what had passed. He gently explained.

"I was just going to call you another," he added; "but since you are better—come, take a turn up and down with me; there, now, your color is coming. Nora, I will take this opportunity to say that I do not wish you to see so much of Philip."

"Oh, papa, he had nothing to do with my fainting—nothing at all."

"Do you know," said her father, slowly, "all the circumstances of Philip's life?"

"No," she answered frankly. "I do not. I only know there is something painful in his past, about which no one speaks."

"It concerns a woman," began her father, then he hesitated.

"Papa," said Nora, "if you wish to tell me anything, whatever it may be, do not be afraid of agitating me. Philip has never made love to me—is nothing to me, as you seem to fear."

"Ah, then," in a tone of relief, "you ought to know the story. Philip is married, and his wife is supposed to be living."

In spite of herself Nora shivered and turned pale.

"Well, when did this happen? Please tell me all," she said, as quietly as she could.

"It isn't a long story, and it's not a very romantic one. He was drawn into the thing when a college youth. He married his landlady's daughter privately; and six weeks after she ran away with his most intimate friend. All this before his twenty-second year was end. He took no steps to trace his wife, and there the matter rested."

"I am glad you told me this, papa," Nora said, simply. "I ought to be pended upon these matters."

Her manner then and after was so calm that her father congratulated himself on his timely revelation. "I might have been too late," he said to himself.

Days passed. Philip did not appear. Then one day a package came to Nora, containing a very small copy of "Doux Souvenir," exquisitely bound in violet. From the pages dropped a note.

"NORA—I have seen your father, who tells me you know all; this has brought me to a sense of my own peril, and I feel I dare not meet you again.

"PHILIP."

Nora told herself she should not, would not, care, and she forced herself to be bright, but she did care for all that, and she laid away "Doux Souvenir—ah! "Triste Souvenir," and never played it now, lest the life went on the same; and one evening she found herself in the artists' reception in company with some friends. Exquisitely dressed, she moved up and down before the beautiful pictures, the music in the air of voices, and the scent of rare flowers, and Nora was almost forgetting to feel sad. There was a pause in the music, and her friends were chatting gaily around her, when, softly, words from an adjoining room came the sounds of "Doux Souvenir." Turning quickly, Nora met Philip's eyes.

He stepped forward. "I must speak to you this once," he said.

With a word of excuse to her friends she took his offered arm and walked to the last room, and there, above within sound of the song.

"Nora," he whispered passionately, "I can not keep away from you—I can not live without you. Speak one word to relieve me from my torture."

But the same set look was on her face, and she stopped suddenly. Her eyes were on a picture hanging near. Two shadowy forms driven by a terrible wind, and the look, and the meaning of the song might have been the sound of its passing.

His and eyes followed hers, his face, too, grew deathly white.

"Nora," he whispered portent, "I take warning. Come away, Nora, come away. Oh, come!"

"No," she answered, dreamily, "I would rather stay."

"Nora," he pleaded, "won't you listen to me? I implore you, for my sake, if you will not for your own."

"I can not move," she whispered; "something holds me to the spot."

A look of torture passed over his face, followed by one of sudden relief, as a young artist passed close to him. "Ernest!" he said, addressing him, "quick! stop that music. I will explain to you afterwards—only be quick."

An exclamation of surprise and pain escaped the artist's lips; but the next moment he dashed forward, saying, "The lady has fainted! Here, this way, I will show you." He threw wide a small door beside them, which had been concealed by a heavy curtain, and opened into a quiet room.

Philip carried in Nora and laid her on a lounge, while the other hastened to admit the air. Then while she lay restored, but white and still, too weak to open her eyes, she heard the stranger say, "Philip, old friend, forgive me if you can. I loved her myself, and not."

"Philip only" answered, quietly, "Where is she now?"

"Dead," groaned the artist; "dead two months since. You never cared for her, and I could forgive my life to save her. Do not excuse my sin. I only ask your pardon."

Nora opened her eyes to see Philip lay his hand in that of the man who had so bitterred her life. Then he said:

"I forgive you now," she heard him say. "I once thought I never could. You painted the Francesca da Rimini?"

"Yes. You noticed the likeness? And did you read the romance and misery that could only paint such anguish?"

"I think I did," he answered.

Nora rose. "Did you paint that lovely, beautiful picture?" she asked turning to the artist.

He bowed.

"I cannot think," she sighed, passing her hand over her brow, "how it is possible; but that is what has haunted me for years when I played 'Doux Souvenir,' until the notes have come to sound like storm winds, and I could see so plainly those weary forms drifting hither and thither—one, ah! one was like you, only a shadow, and the other——"

"She is dead now," he said, hoarsely "let her rest."

Nora turned gently and gave him her hand. "I am sorry for you," she said.

Then Philip drew her away. Without a word he took her back to the friends, not to be absent ever those of his past, about which no one spoke."

"It concerns a woman," began her father, then he hesitated.

"Papa," said Nora, "if you wish to tell me anything, whatever it may be, do not be afraid of agitating me. Philip has never made love to me—is nothing to me, as you seem to fear."

THE CANADIAN REVOLT.

The Government Taking Prompt Measures to Suppress the Rebellion.

Causes of the Trouble—Character of the Rebels—Feelings in the Rescue.

Causes of the Trouble.

J. L. Ramsay, of Calgary, Northwest Territory, arrived in Chicago the other day, and was promptly interviewed. In speaking of the rebellion in Manitoba, Mr. Ramsay said the residents throughout the Northwest are greatly excited, and even at his place, which is 200 miles west of the scene of the present troubles, the people are making active preparations to resist a general Indian outbreak. Mr. Ramsay, however, is of the opinion that the rebels will not go so far west unless Riel and his followers should advance in that direction, in which case the Blackfeet and neighboring Indians, numbering three thousand fighting men, might join in the rebellion with the hopes of securing booty. The Crees, who are located in the extreme northwestern part of the territory, and number fully 15,000 in all, are now only waiting for a favorable opportunity to join Riel. The latter has already sent emissaries among the those tribes, and is using every in order to induce them to join him. The Blackfeet and other tribes people's engaged for war, but the Crees have an abundant supply of arms and ammunition, and if they should unite with the half-breeds in the rebellion will become a very serious matter. Referring to the causes of the trouble, Mr. Ramsay said that for some time there had been general dissatisfaction in the territory on account of the British Government refusing to recognize the land claims of the half-breeds, who, in common with the Indians, are looked upon by the Canadian Government as wards of the Government, and therefore the property of the Government. The half-breeds, however, and the Indians of Manitoba claim that they are as well satisfied of the genuine of the property which they were commissioned a lieutenant in the regular army at Fort Garry, Manitoba.

THE noon in the tower of London in which Sir Walter Raleigh was so long imprisoned is to be fitted up as a museum. It is now that it was impossible for Raleigh to stand erect in it. The walls of the rooms are eighteen feet in thickness, and there is only one window, an opening 10x24 inches, from which the only thing that can be seen is the blank wall of an adjoining building. How Raleigh lived for fourteen years, never being once out of the room until the day on which he was taken to Great Tower Hill to be beheaded.

THE Temple of the Sun at Cuzco, called Coricancha, or "Place of Gold," was the most magnificent edifice in the Incan Empire. It was in the western wall, and opposite the eastern gate, the splendid representation of the sun, the god of the nation, in the form of a human face in gold, with innumerable rays of golden glory emanating from it in every direction; and when the early rays of the morning sun fell upon this brilliant golden disk, the priests, who had kept it as from a mirror and again reflected throughout the whole temple by the numberless plates, cornices, bands and images of gold, until the temple seemed to glow with a sunshine more intense than that of nature.

CANADIAN pigeons have been used from a very early date, and the Coats of the birds at Reghdi takes its name from the pigeon-cote which the old nawab of the convent established. The building has crumbled into ruins long ago by the lapse of time, but the bird messengers of Hagdad became celebrated as far westward as Greece, and were a regular commercial institution between the distant parts of Asia Minor, Arabia and the East. In ancient Egypt they were also brought to great perfection, and between the cities of the Nile and of the Red Sea the old fashion still prevail. Written on silk and tied under the wings of trained doves.

Dr. Reynolds' Work in Michigan.

Dr. Henry A. Reynolds, of Red Ribbon fame, came into our State by invitation of the W. C. T. U., and began a campaign about the holidays.

The meetings have not raised the commotion, which made his reform work eight years ago so phenomenal, but if my one supposes this effort a failure in any sense, or that Dr. Reynolds has lost his strange power over men, they are wholly mistaken.

Everywhere, with one or two exceptions he has been greeted with overflowing houses, while hundreds have signed the total abstinence pledge and started for a new manhood.

Dr. Reynolds does not bring men to the pledge on the foam of oratorical excitement, but goes down to the centers of conviction, and manhood, and discovers, rather thun rescues, the man.

One interesting fact has been developed by his coming again to Michigan, which is, that large numbers of the men who signed the pledge eight years ago, have always been true to it; and many are today in homes of comfort, and places of wealth and influence, who owe their salvation, under God to this noble self-forgetful reformer, who called them to the right path.

The campaign for total abstinence this winter, has faced hard times, the prejudice carried over from the campaign, towards all lines of temperance effort, and divided opinions even among friends, while even worse, professed Christian people young and old, have been so absorbed with "progressive euchre" and roller skating that they have had no time to help the fallen, to seek the lost, or strengthen the weary hands of those who work for God.

Dr. Reynolds is giving a strugely chastened life to this work. The beautiful wife who was at his side in all his toil eight years ago, is in the kingdom where no drunkard may enter, and he carries his own burden for himself and his motherless children, while he seeks to bless others.

At this peculiar stage of the temperance reform, no better thing can be done for a town than to secure the Doctor for a few meetings.

His time is full for some weeks ahead, but dates and terms can be learned by writing to Mrs. E. A. Campbell, Traverse City.

MARY T. LATHROP,
Pres. S. W. C. T. U.

It is with feelings of pride, and pleasure that we find the following glowing tribute of praise, bestowed upon our honored President of the Louisiana W. C. T. U., Mrs. Mary T. Lathrop, one of Michigan's brightest intellects, and most noble women, commissioned by "High Heaven," to raise the fallen and rescue the perishing. We bless God for a Mary T. Lathrop, and would them were many such as she. We quote from a New Orleans paper of recent date:

The annual State Convention of the Louisiana Women's Christian Temperance Union held its final sessions yesterday, after meetings most brilliant and eminently satisfactory to the noble workers who have done so much for the temperance cause, not only here, but all over the country.

The closing session was held at night in Ames Chapel, a large audience being present to listen to an address by Mrs. Mary Lathrop, who, it must be said, has made a great conquest over the New Orleans public who have had the very good fortune to hear her speak. It is universally conceded that Mrs. Lathrop is as brilliant, as witty, as practical and logical as any man lecturer who ever addressed a New Orleans audience, and that, perhaps, is just as much praise and as high praise as any woman ought to ever hope to win. While Mrs. Lathrop's pathos, interest never flags, attention is never distracted and minds grow weary. Her lecture last evening was a powerful protest against the crimes of intemperance, a practical exposition of the evils of it, of the miserable woes of it."—[Traverse Eagle.

Whiskey Did It.

Grayling, Apr. 3.—A log train ran over a man early this morning about 3 miles north of this place, completely severing the head from the body. Investigation showed that the deceased was a hard working man named Barney R. Hosner, about 35 years of age, who lived near Fredersville. He had just finished a logging job for Salling, Hanson & Co., came down there yesterday to settle up, became intoxicated missed the train, started for home on foot and was killed by the cars. The condition of the body when found indicated that he had been frozen to death before the engine struck him. He had on his person $180 and a broken whiskey bottle near by.

Charlevoix, Mich., Harbor and Summer Resorts.

The above is a geographically correct view (though containing but a small portion of the buildings) of Charlevoix, Mich., a village of over twelve hundred inhabitants, rapidly growing in favor and reputation as one of the most delightful Summer Resorts and safest harbors in northern Michigan. Several lines of steamers concentrate here, connecting at all hours of the day with surrounding towns, fishing streams, picnic parks, and other places of interest, health, and pleasure. Unexpected inducements are also offered the permanent settler who desires to invest his capital in manufacturing enterprises where it will bring the best results. The resources of the county are being developed so as to bring the richest returns. For any other information regarding the village or surroundings, address

ALL ABOUT TEETH.

A Few Moments With the Dentists.

"A woman with fine teeth and a sweet breath cannot be ugly," was a saying of Jean Jacques Rousseau that modern dentists never tire of quoting. Beautiful, white, even teeth never fail to attract admiration to their possessor, while a mouthful, or even two or three, protruding teeth will mar the highest type of beauty. Some otherwise pretty mouths are rendered unsightly by an overabundance of teeth which are so crowded as to overlay one another, and if the upper lip be short the effect is anything but esthetical. Others have two long upper teeth that are known as "squirrel teeth" and make it difficult to keep the mouth closed. With the present perfection in dentistry the first defect can be readily corrected by extracting one or more of the teeth, loosening the others and training them into a natural position. Nothing can be done with "squirrel" and "dog teeth" but to replace them with false ones, which are now always better than the original, and, besides being perfectly comfortable, defy detection. All cannot have perfectly white teeth, for there is as much difference in the shade of enamel as there is in hair, but soiled, unkept teeth are an abomination. Whether false or natural the same care is necessary to neatness no less than health.

The most common disease of the teeth is tartar, a calcareous deposit due to the excess of lime in the saliva and a lack of care in cleaning. This annoyance has received the most careful consideration of medical dentists, and there are almost as many theories current as there are students. Some enthusiasts on the subject of germs uphold the theory of animalcules. They advance the argument that the insect is supplied with tentaculars or feelers which enable it to grasp and gather in the sediment contained in liquid and some solid foods, just as the coral appropriates the lime of salt water. These zoophytes make their habitation on that part of the gum which projects up between the teeth. It is noticeable that in certain localities where hard or mineral waters are found the people are more troubled with tartaric teeth than those who consume soft water. While many erudite students hold to this theory, the common belief is that particles of food are allowed to collect on the flap of the gum overlaying the back of the teeth, forming a lodgment for the lime in the saliva.

Said a dentist: "It takes some little time to cleanse the teeth properly—that is, using freely the vertical movement instead of the horizontal, and going over the whole set twice at least, the last time with clear water, to remove any jot of tooth-powder that might have been left. As for the brush, we always recommend just as hard and stiff a bristle as may be used without making the gums bleed. Attention will not hurt them, but it is not safe to rupture them. On the other hand, a soft bristle is little better than nothing, for the hairs bend under pressure and fail to clean the surface to which they are applied."

Disease of the gums and injury to the teeth from spurious dentifrices are not common, but there is danger nevertheless to be apprehended by some preparations. Nearly all washes contain borax, an element that is very cleansing, but deleterious to the gums and teeth. Strong tooth-soaps are highly injurious on account of the powerful alkali they contain. Charcoal should never be used unless subjected to great pressure and intense heat. It is cleansing, refreshing, and considerable of an antiseptic, but a pernicious enemy to the enamel, for it cannot be pulverized so fine as to obliterate the needle-like fineness of its fibres. Salt is to be preferred to carbon, as the crystals are soluble, but it is not sufficient for the requirements. It leaves the mouth refreshed and eliminates the circulation, but if the gums are sensitive it is not to smart them. It is a safe rule to repudiate any powder or compound, no matter how cleansing it may be to the teeth, that irritates the gums and leaves the mouth parched and drawn. The best dentifrice known to science is a combination of orris root, Dutch prepared chalk, and pulverized eucalyptus leaves, which any professional pharmacist will compound.

The teeth are not intended to be used as nut-crackers, nor for breaking thread and tearing cloth. Acid spoils the enamel; even lemon, sour pickles, though women do rub the peel on their teeth and gums to make the one white and the other red, which use, Cayenne says, produces cavities, that cried enemy to the mouth. Hot as well as cold water is injurious as a wash; tepid water is better the year round.

Not From Father to Son.

The fatal fondness of many Americans for large profits growing out of their haste to get rich has had a good deal to do with the unsatisfactory condition of our export trade in some directions. Complaints are frequently made on this score in Consuls in their reports to the State Department. Consignments which do not come up to the guaranteed standard of quality, and in many cases instances of deliberate fraud, have caused serious losses to innocent parties and unsettled confidence in the business integrity of American shippers.

It is probable that the average of commercial morality is as high here as anywhere on earth, but the prevalent ambition to acquire sudden wealth, and the idea entertained by many young men that a business career is to be used only to that end and then abandoned have naturally resulted in numerous dishonest practices in foreign trade which have reacted upon the country at large.

In England and Continental Europe the manufacture of certain articles has been carried on for certain families for generations, and the good name acquired represents the principal capital employed. The original producer may have perfected an article and gained a world-wide reputation for fair dealing and the excellence of his goods. His successors endeavor to maintain his standards, so that articles which we purchase to-day, believing them to be the best, may be precisely the same things which under the same trade mark were sold one or two hundred years ago. In this country such cases are rare. An industrious mechanic or inventor who makes a fortune by the manufacture of a superior article, leaving his business and his wealth to his sons, is, as a rule, soon forgotten, for the new generation, thinking more of luxury than of business honor or prosperity, will soon sell out to some money-maker, or will themselves run the business into the ground through a failure to observe the same rules of success which made their father rich and respected.

On the other continent the mere possession of wealth is not a sufficient reason for the abandonment of business. Here too many young men, made rich through the self-sacrifice and toil of their parents, fritter away in their efforts to enjoy their wealth business reputations which are worth more to them than their fortunes. It is not the rule in America for sons to succeed their fathers in business even where the parent has been successful. The money gained by the older in an honorable business career is usually squandered or subsisted upon by the would-be aristocratic sons in idleness.

With nearly all manufacturing, mercantile or commercial business thus confined to one generation it is almost inevitable that sharpers should gain possession and take advantage of reputations valuable to them only as they are able to make money out of them. These are some of the reasons why American commercial integrity is sometimes questioned abroad.—Chicago Herald.

Five Car Loads of Relics.

Col. Stevenson, of the Bureau of Ethnology, Washington, who has recently spent several months in the West, has brought back the largest and most diverse collection of objects illustrating the home life, industries and religious customs of the Pueblo Indians ever made. In addition to the articles in this collection (which amount to five car loads, and consist of pottery, woven fabrics, weapons and stone implements), photograph and colored sketches were secured in great number illustrating the dances, altar scenes, games and burial customs of the Pueblo tribes. Many curious cave shrines never before visited by white men were explored, places to which for centuries the Zunis have been in the habit of making annual pilgrimages with great ceremony to deposit idols, plume sticks and the skulls and bones of sacred animals. A large train party visited, under the guidance of Zunian priests, a curious salt lake, seventy-five miles south of the Pueblo, whence the supply of salt used by the tribe is obtained, and from this point the travelers rode 150 miles west to a lake where, according to Zunian belief, the departed spirits of the Pueblos are all transported. To the latter place the guides could not be induced to go, though they pointed it out from a distance. The lake, which is but a few hundred yards in diameter, is surrounded by curious conical hills, formed by the deposit of matter from innumerable springs. The springs are now dry, except such as are beneath the surface of the water, but some of the cones have open caverns into which one can penetrate by covered way one or three hundred feet.—New York Herald.

Burlette in a Michigan Cemetery.

I like to get away from the live men and seek the companionship of the dead ones. I believe I love the dead people. It is good to stroll about among the tombstones, and look down upon the graves of them that sleep. You seem to enter some of the sweet quiet of their boundless repose, and as you read their names and think of them all this great, tumultuous four of death passes away. One day, away out in Blodgett, Mich., I left the little (one the town is usually about all I do leave after collecting my fees)—I left the little town, dozing away the early March afternoon, and strolled out to the acre where the sleepers await the resurrection dawn. I climbed at the stones as I pass along the little mounds and wonder that people should live so long. Most of the spirit ones—could they hear me as I walked through the dead grass and mulling leaves, I wondered? most of them seemed to have dropped asleep in good old age, far down the quiet afternoon of life. Like an old man falling asleep in his arm chair watching the fading sunlight slip away, and the creeping shadows falling over the mossbows and brown stubble sides. How tenderly you feel toward the dead you have never known as you stand among them.—Brooklyn Eagle.

Concise Record of the Week.

THE DYING SOLDIER.

Gen. Grant's Obstinate Battle with Death

The condition of Gen. Grant on the morning of the 5th, as reported by the physicians, is that date was serious. He had very bad nervous phenomena. He had a low coughing and painful fever, and the physicians set it down to a gradual development of sores in the throat. The pain in the throat was so painful that it keeping sleep from his eyes, reducing his strength, and causing, and he complained frequently of his inability to sleep. He changed from his couch to the arm-chair three times during the night in order to stop the cough and enable him to breathe with greater ease, but he was so exhausted that he could not stand than he wanted to change again. Sleep was his greatest need, and the physicians decided that the medicine was required to be more serious than the doses of laudanum hitherto. During Saturday and Sunday the patient had frequently been speaking in a low voice, but in the only talk to himself, and this to be apparently of a very definite nature, making now and then references to his participation in battles. Among the many things he said was that he had fought a battle yesterday and a battle the day before, mentioning the amount of ammunition used in each battle which the Union forces had used during many years ago. The General had long lucid intervals, and spoke clearly and rationally on the entire complete.

According to the bulletins sent out by telegraph, then, Grant's condition on the morning of the 5th was very critical, and he was very low. During the preceding twenty-four hours he had been troubled with a very severe inflammation. He took his nourishment regularly, and frequently walked about the room. The doctors say that it is clear that the cancer attacks the throat, and is doing its deadly work, and that the end might come at any moment.

"There has been an extraordinary improvement in the condition of Gen. Grant during the past twenty-four hours, and the physicians and family assume nothing, of course, but we may indulge in a very decided feeling of the dissipation of the cloud of the 5th last. The General was able to sit up in his chair yesterday, and walked feel better than for a long time. He slept long on the night of the 5th, and on the morning, soon after sun-rise, and while Mrs. Grant was in the adjoining room, the General became agitated and gave him a pad of writing paper, and he wrote as follows:

"The doctor thinks I am better this morning. I am better. I am better. I am better

BUSINESS.

Proceedings of the Citizens' Meeting.

Pursuant to call as published in the JOURNAL, a meeting was held at the Village hall last Saturday evening, attended by nearly 200 of our business men and mechanics.

The house was called to order by A. D. Cruickshank, who stated briefly the object of the meeting. John Nicholls was made chairman, and Chas. J. Strang secretary.

To open the discussion, R. W. Kane called for remarks from those of our citizens who have been longest in the work of improvement, and desired especially to hear from J. Milo Eaton, who has been prominently connected with nearly every important work in the history of the village.

Mr. Eaton dwelt briefly on past efforts, and gave his ideas of the formation of an association to keep the work moving. As to the first and special work to be done (the building of a grist mill) he referred to conversations with Mr. Hankey of Petoskey, who had offered to build a mill here, if a large bonus was given him.

Geo. W. Crouter had talked with Mr. Hankey. The latter had bought 14,000 bushels of wheat the past year, two thirds of which was grown on land near Charlevoix, some of it passing through Charlevoix, right by our very doors,—and nearly every team carried back the prices of the land in merchandise which would have been taken from Charlevoix merchants if the wheat could have been sold here. Mr. Crouter also referred to the constitution and by-laws of Traverse City Business Men's Association, as published in the Michigan Tradesman, and asked that they be read by the secretary, which was done. Later discussion showed clearly that this was not the kind of an association now wanted, but might follow later on.

Mr. Nicholls referred briefly to the many loads of wheat drawn to Petoskey, and also to the work of Mr. Ingalls who had built a mill there. He thought Charlevoix ought to do as much here as Mr. Ingalls had there alone.

Mr. Cruickshank thought the people should begin now to move in some direction. Our resources lie around us undeveloped. Good men, skillful mechanics, lie idle a large part of the year, because the business of the town is not such as to keep them employed all the time, especially during the winter. Every thousand dollars of outside capital brought here enriches the town so much besides helping to give employment to every hand through which it passes. The same amount from our own pockets does not increase the wealth but simply changes its usual channel. We want an association to induce men to come here, and then see that they are properly met and shown our advantages when they do come. It is a fact that many times men have come here, not only willing to invest their small capital, and go to work, but anxious to do so, and they were not only not encouraged to stay, but were actually discouraged, and advised not to stay. To support this assertion, several well know cases of recent occurrance were mentioned. It is not difficult to get men with capital to come here. They are charmed with our location as soon as they arrive, and can be induced to remain and invest if met with anything like a disposition to be courteous and progressive. We do not now need an association like that at Traverse City, but we do need a committee to properly advertise the town, and then show that we have what we advertise.

Mr. J. G. Reid asked to represent the farmers of the vicinity of Charlevoix. He said if the farmers would be encouraged they would increase their product in every particular demanded. Many of them are discouraged, and trying to sell out, simply because the timber business at best furnishes little more than a bare existance. There was no inducement to raise grain or fruit, for there was no market at home. If they could not have a market pay, what nearer home they would be compelled to move nearer to markets already established. He had no doubt that if a mill was built here this summer, the acreage of wheat would increase at least one-fourth the first year.

J. M. Clark agreed substantially with the preceding speakers as to the need of a mill, and better roads leading into the country. He referred also to the efforts of Mr. H. B. Chapman to locate here before he invested at Bay Springs, and had no doubt there were others with just as much capital, just as willing,—yes anxious,—to invest if here as he was.

John Bell thought the old settlers were passing away so rapidly that the work of such an association should fall on young men who have fresh, ambitious blood.

C. J. Grier read the constitution and by-laws of the "Committee of Fifty," of Charlotte, Mich., and explained its workings and results. Later speakers seemed to agree that it embodied all that was necessary to our success.

Robert Miller related some items of experience of the earlier settlers, and mentioned one instance where a man who wanted a site on which to build a machine and boiler shop was actually advised to not stay here because we had already one of each of these industries. He thought every shop or store of whatever kind was a benefit to the town, because, while it increased the competition in soliciting business, it increased the necessary business of almost every other industry, and was so much real wealth added to our village.

J. M. Clark thought a committee to tell the truth about our resources could accomplish wonders.

Byron Sise moved that a committee of five on permanent organization be appointed, to report at a future meeting, which motion was carried. The chair appointed as such committee Messrs. E. M. Clark, Geo. W. Crouter, A. E. Mason, Robert Miller, and A. D. Upright.

Mr. Nicholls stated some facts in regard to the erection of mills at other points, and advised that we must act promptly to accomplish our work before the tide is turned in another direction.

A motion to adjourn one week was discussed and withdrawn, the time being too far distant.

Mr. Kane thought a committee should be appointed to prepare plans of work for securing the grist mill.

On motion of Mr. Eaton a committee of three was appointed to do this work. The chair appointed Messrs. Eaton, Cruickshank, and Sise.

The hour being late, the meeting adjourned to Monday evening at 7:30 to complete the organization.

ADJOURNED MEETING.

On Monday evening a constitution was adopted and signed. (We desired to publish the constitution and by-laws this week, but it was thought best to wait until the association was fully organized.) The association is to be known as the "Charlevoix Improvement Association," and the officers will consist of president, first and second vice presidents, recording secretary, financial secretary and treasurer. There is also to be an executive committee of three members, a corresponding committee of three members and a reception committee of ten members.

The committee on grist mill made a verbal report, and were continued, to report further at the next meeting, to be held next Saturday evening.

Unpleasant Truths.

The discussions at the citizens meeting last Saturday evening reveal a condition of affairs here little dreamed of by our people generally, especially among those who have but recently located here. They reveal, it seems to us, a most discouraging aspect to property holders, especially if the present movement should falter or fail, as some croakers have already begun to predict. The few pros no lives equied elsewhere show that our own town is not the only one interested in this move. We are being watched by people all over the state. We are being freely advertised by influential and widely circulated newspapers. We must not fail. We must not even hesitate an instant. We must push on to success. Let us change the record, and never again have it said that any man was discouraged from locating and investing capital here, when he had come for that express purpose.

Sand.

"The people of Charlevoix seem inclined to take a sensible view of the situation. Deprived of the county seat, they propose to turn their undivided attention to the work of building up the commercial and manufacturing interests of Charlevoix. * * * A court house and jail don't make a city. The possession of active and sagacious business men, and the investment of capital in enterprises which foster and feed labor, will build up a town irrespective of county seat advantages."—[Petoskey Record.

Charlevoix don't propose to sit down and blubber over the loss of the county seat, but is taking steps for more and famous a manufacturing and general business center. She is chock-full of vim and freshness, and is bound to make a noise in the world.—[Kalamazoo Telegraph.

Notwithstanding Charlevoix has lost the county seat, her citizens don't propose to go into the cemetery business just yet.—[Detroit Journal.

Put Him on Record.

It is not time now to indulge in recriminations on the result of the county seat question, but we have some facts which deserve to go on record. We are reliably informed that a certain politician of some influence procured the publication in two certain papers in the southern part of the state, articles false in every particular as applying to Charlevoix, setting forth as facts, with editorial comment, that Charlevoix was secretly trying to get articles of incorporation as a city for the express purpose of influencing and defeating the submission of the removal of the county seat forever in the future. The circulation of those papers at a time and in a manner to preclude all possibility of their being answered by Charlevoix, influenced hundreds of voters (if it did not really turn the majority, for all of which there is great rejoicing in the camp of this man and his friends. But he has political aspirations, and also some of his friends may, and they may find their shrewdest diplomacy reacting as a boomerang with most fearful force. We shall see.

Spring Prospects at Ironton.

Speaking of the spring prospects at Ironton the East Jordan Enterprise says: "The company will enlarge their store building by erecting another building north of their present store, of the same size. They will increase their stock by adding a full line of furniture and undertakers goods. There is also in large hotel going up on the south side of the company's store, with an avenue running east and west between the store and hotel extending to the lake, where a large dock is to be built for the accomodation of the traveling public. Every attention will be given toward making Ironton one of the principal commercial points in the county and good inducements are offered for business of various kinds to open up in the village. Ironton now has a daily mail and arrangements are completed for a through line of boats from Chicago."

East Jordan.

A recent number of the Detroit Evening News contained the following concerning our neighbors:

East Jordan, the new county seat of Charlevoix, is situated in the beautiful, well watered, and beautifully timbered section known as the Grand Traverse region. It lies at the head of the south arm of Pine lake, 18 miles from Lake Michigan, and 13 miles west of Boyne Falls. The town is situated on a plat of land rising in terraces back from the lake to a hight of between 40 and 50 feet. Nature has done well her part for the location chosen, which only awaits the hand of enterprise to transform it into one of the pleasantest places in northern Michigan. For the sportsman it possesses many attractions. The celebrated trout stream, the "Jordan river," enters the lake at this point. The forest abounds in all kinds of game generally found in northern Michigan. The place now has a population of about 600, has two churches, a seminary, a good school, has two good hotels, its quota of drug, dry goods and grocery stores, two machine shops and foundry, five saw mills, which will manufacture this season 20,000,000 feet of hardwood lumber, and two shingle mills in process of erection for manufacturing cedar shingles. Good docks have been erected over which thousands of cords of wood and lumbark go annually, and at which vessels can be loaded for any port in the world. It is the last opening for a grist mill in the region, there being none nearer than Boyne Falls. It has a daily mail, telegraphic communication, prospects of railroad communication at an early day. In the season of navigation two lines of steamers make this point daily. Its secret societies are in a flourishing condition, comprising masons, odd fellows, good templars, G. A. R., K. O. T. M., and orangemen. Its citizens are alive and energetic people and have full faith in the future of East Jordan.

The Ironton Ferry.

Lansing, April 16, 1885.

EDITOR JOURNAL.—At the request of many citizens of your county I have this day secured the passage of a bill by the House, enabling your board of supervisors by a two-thirds vote to establish and maintain a public ferry at Ironton. As the bill sent me required re-drafting, and as the regular course of printing and general order would have delayed the bill several weeks I had it passed immediately in manuscript. As there are no printed copies of the bill, I send you the following copy for publication if you consider it of sufficient importance:

A BILL to authorize the board of supervisors of Charlevoix county to establish, maintain, and operate a ferry across the south arm of Pine lake, at or near Ironton, in said county.

Section 1. The People of the State of Michigan enact, That the board of supervisors of Charlevoix county be and are hereby authorized and empowered at any lawful meeting of said board, to locate and establish a public ferry across the south arm of Pine lake at or near Ironton, in said county, and to make provision for the maintenance and operation of the same in such manner, and subject to such rules, regulations, and tolls as they may so fix from time to time to fix and adopt; Provided, that none of the powers mentioned in this act shall be exercised unless authorized by a two-thirds vote of the supervisors of said county.

Senator Francis will secure prompt passage and immediate effect in the Senate, and the bill will probably be a law by Monday or Tuesday next.

Yours truly, C. S. HAMILTON.

Buy Only Pure Tea.

At a time when the public taste has become vitiated and depraved through long indulgence in artifically colored teas, it is refreshing to mark the courageous stand taken by Messrs. J. L. Hurd & Co., against the indefensible and hurtful practice of imparting such injurious substances. Messrs. J. L. Hurd & Co., are the sole importers of a guaranteed pure article of Japan tea bearing the felicitous name of "May flower Tea." We confidently recommend this brand as combining full strength with exquisite aroma, obtainable only in Perfection Tea Cups.

M. E. Church.

The discourse at the M. E. church last Sunday evening was received so favorably that a request was made to have it repeated at some future time, and upon ample notice being given. The elder agreed to gratify the wish.

Preaching at the M. E. church next Sunday morning. The Sunday School follows at 11:30. All the members are requested to be present.

A gang of alcohol-drinking logs, some over ten and some under five years old, were arraigned in the New Haven (Conn.) police court a few days ago. Their leaders, aged eight and nine respectively, incorrigible thieves and truants, were sent to the Reform school. All of them were addicted with rum and tobacco.

Since the death of Zack Chandler the republican party in Michigan has been without a leader, and the beaning of its decay may safely be pined at that event.

DANGER.

Do you know that you are liable to attacks of dyspepsia and all kinds of stomach derangements? Yes, some still, to that result of kidney and liver disorder that is known as diabetes or possibly bright's disease. They are often fatal and that in a very short time. Loss of appetite, sour stomach, dimness of vision, dizziness, pains in side and back and many others are but the symptoms of diseases. Be wise in time. Parmelee's Dyspepsia Bitters, Kidney and Liver Cure is the sovereign remedy. Large bottles $1.00.

Sold by Dr. G. W. Crouter, Charlevoix, and Crouter & Harris, Ironton.

COUGHS AND COLDS

Are the inevitable results of sudden changes in the weather. Immediate attention should be given them as the they may not become established as a result in bronchitis, congestion, inflammation or even consumption. Hamilton's Cough Balsam soothes the irritated membrane, and assists in removing phlegm and mucus, that, by their presence, are continually keeping up a hard coughing. Great relief is received by even those in the last stages of consumption. Its strong and whooping cough it is unequaled. Price 25 and 50 cents per bottle.

Sold by Dr. G. W. Crouter, Charlevoix, and Crouter & Harris, Ironton.

SCIENTIFIC INVESTIGATION

Has proved that nothing but a local application can cure the many formed piles, that so trouble all classes of mankind. In all forms of piles, immediate and careful attention is needed. By faithfully following the directions given with each box of Parmelee's Pile Ointment a cure is certain. Warranted to give immediate relief. Price 50 cents per box.

Sold by Dr. G. W. Crouter, Charlevoix, and Crouter & Harris, Ironton.

IN THE SPRING

Nature intends that the human body should be relieved of the heavy, clog and humors which always accumulate during the winter months, and the very best medicine for accomplishing this object is Parmelee's Blood Purifier. It will cleanse and purify the system and drive out all humors and impurity safely and quickly. Price $1.00 for large bottles.

Sold by Dr. G. W. Crouter, Charlevoix, and Crouter & Harris, Ironton.

Jay Price will engage in the barber business on his own account in a short time, occupying rooms in Washburn's building near the bridge Street house. It is a good location.

Inland Marine, the sailors' paper recently launched in Chicago, seems to have fair wind for each trip, with increasing freights. As a common carrier of nautical information it is evidently a success.

"It is useless to talk of much manufacturing here until there is a railroad." It is equally useless to expect a railroad until there is some permanent business besides the summer resorts, to induce one to come here.

The press of Michigan is doing a noble work for Charlevoix in its free notices of our harbor. Let it come to naught by any backwardness on the part of our water front is received with substantial lectures.

On Tuesday morning, A. D. Cruickshank's little girl climbed upon the stove with a bottle in her hand, breaking the bottle, the piece of which struck her on the forehead, cutting a deep gash over an inch long.

A report comes from the Bayous that the schooner Charles Weeks, which went ashore at Waiska Bay last fall has entirely disappeared. Her cargo of lumber is scattered in all directions over the lake.—Inland Marine.

There are lively times now at Wash burn's shingle yard. The feet of steamers and the tug Martin are all sending cargoes in pairs to bolts and machinery and all will go into the water in a few days well prepared for the season's business.

The tug Higgie is receiving extensive upper works, as well as new boilers, plank, etc., and with the repairs which will be given to the machinery, she will be as good as new for the business of this part. She will be launched Saturday.

The legal fraternity of Charlevoix county has an addition in the person of Mr. W. N. Moore, late of Ionia, who has just settled in East Jordan. Mr. Moore comes well recommended, and will no doubt be heartily welcomed to that new and growing community.

The Michigan Manual for 1885 is now at hand. It is an improvement on older editions in several respects, and contains among other things a large number of new statistical tables, and revised district and railroad maps, the whole adding about fifty pages to the size of the book.

The steamer Wright has been sold to Hall, Wolfe & Douglas, of Bellaire, and she is to be thoroughly overhauled and refitted, and fitted up in first class condition generally. When finished she will be transferred to the inland lakes and do a freight and passenger business between Bellaire and Torch Lake.

Mrs. Florence M. Nelson, wife of Thos. F. Nelson, editor of the East Jordan Enterprise, died at the home of her parents, in Norwood, on Monday, aged 24 years. Her health has been very poor for over a year, and she has been confined to her bed for twelve weeks. She leaves a little daughter about a year old.

The proposition to move the county seat of Charlevoix county to East Jordan was carried by a majority of 86. The fight is not over with yet, however, for Boyne City will now come to for the spoils, and for the next few years the citizens of our adjoining county may expect some lively times on the county seat question.—Vanderbilt Review.

It does one's eyes good to see the great piles of new clothing on Geo. W. Miller's tables and shelves since he opened the last two or three invoices. Six long tables are piled high with coats alone, ranging from cheap every-day wear in the latest and best dress suits. Shelves and show cases contain a full proportion of other furnishing goods of all descriptions. See his new advertisement on another page.

The long sickness of Mrs. T. F. Nelson, resulting in death, as announced elsewhere, has made a severe struggle for the editor of the Enterprise. Editing a local paper in one town while at the same time caring for a sick wife in another town twelve miles distant, with such roads as we have had the past winter, cannot be done with enlisted success for either work. The people of East Jordan should give the sons a reasonable season before trying to crowd him out, by starting an opposition paper.

Rev. Dr. Graves, of Grand Rapids, Editor of the S. S. Graves, of Charlevoix, received the official notice, last Sunday, of his election as president of the Baptist theological seminary for colored men, situated at Atlanta, Ga. The doctor looks with never favor upon this college than the Central University of Iowa, of which he was elected president last week, and will probably accept the former position. He will enter upon his duties October 1, 1885.

BRIDGE LETTING.

Notice is hereby given that sealed proposals will be received by the undersigned, Commissioner of Highways of the township of Charlevoix, County of Charlevoix, State of Michigan, on the 20th day of April, A. D. 1885, at 10 o'clock a. m., for letting the bridge across Pine River, at and near the village of East Jordan, in said township, on the first day of June, A. D. 1885, or place aforesaid, I will contract with the lowest bidder giving good and sufficient security for the faithful performance of the work.

Dated this 13th day of April, 1885.

D. C. NETTLETON,
Commissioner of Highways,
for the Township of Charlevoix.

STATE OF MICHIGAN—Thirteenth Judicial Circuit—In Chancery. Michael E. Keller, complainant, vs. Samuel R. Keller, defendant. It appearing to the Circuit Court for the county of Charlevoix, in chancery, that the defendant in the suit above named, is a resident of this state, and that his whereabouts are unknown to the complainant, and his appearance has been duly issued and that the same could not be served for the reason that he could not be found in the state. On motion of R. L. Corbett, solicitor for complainant, it is ordered that defendant enter his appearance in said cause on or before five months from date of this order, and that in default thereof the complainant's bill be taken as confessed. And it is further ordered that in order to be published in the Charlevoix Journal, a newspaper printed, published and circulated in said county, and publication to be continued therein, once in each week, for six weeks in succession.

The Chicago Daily News

Has the Largest Daily Circulation in America.

Its issue for the year 1884 averaged 125,178 copies daily, and it is now regularly printing over 130,000 papers a day.

The magnitude of this unequaled circulation is best appreciated when it is said that it exceeds the circulations of all other Chicago dailies combined. Taking from the three standard newspaper directories—Ayer & Son's Annual, Rowell's Directory and Hubbard's Directory—the quotations which most nearly represent the actual circulations of the Chicago press, the following diagram correctly illustrates their relative positions as to extent of circulation.

From these figures it appears that the circulation of THE CHICAGO DAILY NEWS exceeds the combined circulations of all the other Chicago dailies by 72,464 copies daily. The reasons for this phenomenal success are obvious:

THE CHICAGO DAILY NEWS is a complete newspaper in all that constitutes the best general newspaper.

It is a member of the Associated Press, and is the only 2 cent paper in the West that possesses this first essential to a complete news service. In addition, it has its own private wires (by lease from the Western Union Telegraph Co.) connecting its Chicago office with New York and Washington, at both of which points it has its own news bureaus. THE CHICAGO DAILY NEWS prints ALL the news.

It is an independent paper. It recognizes the utility of political parties as means for the accomplishment of proper ends, but it declines to regard any party as a fit subject for unquestioning adoration. It solicits the patronage of intelligent, thoughtful, honest people, wherever country more than party.

THE CHICAGO DAILY NEWS

Is a "short cut" to the public paper. It believes that newspaper reading is but an incident of the day, not its chief business. It accordingly leaves to the "blanket-sheets" the monopoly of tiresome and worthless amplification. It seeks to say all that the reader should care to read, and to say it in the shortest possible manner. It is a daily paper for busy people.

It is a clean paper, fit for the family circle. It is a cheap paper—2 cents per day, 12 cents per week, 50 cents per month, $6.00 per year. Sold by all news dealers throughout the Northwest. Mailed to any address, post paid, upon receipt of price.

Where the facilities of a daily mail are not enjoyed THE CHICAGO WEEKLY NEWS is recommended as "the next best." It is a large 8 page, 64 column paper, carefully made up to meet all the varying needs of the family circle. It is the largest "dollar weekly" in America. It is equal to the best.

A FROLIC ON THE FLOOR.

BY WILLIAM HAUGHTON.

What's the matter with you, neighbor?
Is there any reason why
That your mouth is growing sallow
And there's pandemic in your eye?
What's you look as if you fainted
All on earth ever I had
Is a little frolic with my daughter
You would put me in the blues.
Have you ever tried what solace
There is in the single sense?
Not! Then you should begin it;
Take a partner, pick up your heel,
Set a jacket, if it tumbles,
Then I've thought of a remedy o'er—
Have you ever tried a jamb
With the youngsters on the floor?

Tut, man! It is no wonder
Life's a burden, life's a grind, and gray;
Tho' the heavens be jet-black
All your heart and soul away;
That the merry god of laughter
In your bosom never rang,
Eg you've missed the girls' pastime
Just can make an old heart young.
Oh, the laughing, laughing sweetness!
Oh, the laughing dimpled face!
Oh, the coaxing and the cheating
Of a happy-hearted chap!
There's a magic mingle in it
Which you never heard before.
Try it, neighbor, for a minute—
Try it before the door.

Why, good man, the very heavy
In the cockles will expire
When he sees an injury-jersey,
Hears a laugh, or hears a jew.
And young Joe, the cooper's swearing
Tho' he cuts all to pieces
Two positions for the dancing,
And his medicine, man, for the
Oh, he's amazed and astonished!
Oh, the mother raging wild!
Oh, the sister's mortification
Of a sister's shame!
Now, steel not, Jim, don't drop it,
Will it not cure the pensive?
Then go home, good man, and try it—
Try a frolic on the floor.

MATTIE VAN WYCK'S STORY.

BY HETTIE J. POTTER.

The fire burned low in the little home of the Van Wycks, nothing was heard but the ticking of the clock and the purring of the old gray cat. The night was frosty without, the tall pine trees cast their long shadows across the snow; everything seemed tranquil to Mattie Van Wyck as she looked out of the window, then going back to the stove, stirred the smoldering fire.

The Van Wycks were very well-to-do a few years back, Mr. Van Wyck having lost quite a property left him, but being an easy-going man and not having the ability to make money, his property gradually slipped through his hands; and after selling his farm and paying his debts, left him but little. He decided to go West, and finally bought a little farm in Northern town, having a little home which took nearly all he saved. He worked hard on the pineries and kept his family supplied from day to day, but from severe exposure, contracted a hard cold and died, leaving his wife and four children to the mercies of a northern winter.

The oldest child, Mattie, was a bright, energetic little girl of 15. She was attending school, but would have to give it up for a while at least, and stay at home to help her mother, who by taking in sewing had kept the wolf from the door ever since her father's death. Mattie had sat up later than usual to do her sums, and now, with her chin resting on her hands, sat looking intently into the fire, wondering what she could do to help along. The problem was a hard one for a slender girl, and she gave it up for the night, and, locking up the house, took her light and trotted off to bed.

The next day was Sunday. After the frugal breakfast, the dishes were washed and the house put to rights. Mrs. Van Wyck got the children ready for Sunday-school, combed their hair, made them look as neatly as possible, all except Johnnie, who was a sturdy little fellow with black eyes and red cheeks. He had played hard and stubbed out his knees, so he would have to stay at home for a while till Providence or Santa Claus sent him some new ones. He made up quite a lip, and a big tear rolled down his cheek as he looked out of the window after his sisters; but "he mend dry his eyes and be a good little boy," his mother said, "for some day he would be a man, and take care of them all."

Johnnie caught the idea at once, climbed down from the window and insisted himself helping his mother by bringing in wood, and in various ways; and was very happy. The day passed quietly and pleasantly; the children came home each with a fresh new book.

In the evening, as they were seated around the table reading, Mattie broke the silence by saying:

"Mother, I wish I could write a story. When we were at the library to-day I heard Lizzie Foster telling Gertie Manning that she had an aunt in Boston who wrote stories and made lots of money. Now if I could only do something like that how nice it would be."

"You might try, Mattie," her mother replied; "we never know what we can do till we've tried."

"If I only knew what to write about."

"Write about your home, brother and sisters," Mrs. Van Wyck suggested.

Mattie was quite pleased with the idea, and went and got paper and pencil. If she could only make some money, all herself, buy some new books and clothes, some mittens for Amy and Christmas would soon be here, and how nice it would be to surprise them all.

She sat down and began. It was not an easy task, but she kept diligently at it all the spare time she had, her mother being busy at the machine from early morning till late at night.

The close of the term was near at hand, and in three weeks—the holidays. Mattie looked pretty blue; and when her mother she had written about her home, but she thought the story need a brighter side, and was afraid she would have to give it up. Her mother told her she had a good beginning, and not to worry any way, as she was a great help to her, and as soon as she could, would send her to school again. Mattie took her books and trudged to school with a heavy heart. She had planned so many little surprises with the money she would get, that to fail with her story was a bitter disappointment; but she studied hard and had her lessons. One day she noticed an unusual excitement among some of her schoolmates, and overheard one little girl saying to another "that Gracie Thornton was going to give a birthday party the next evening." Mattie thought no more about it, till on her way home a bright thought struck her; she walked more briskly and rushed into the house, exclaiming, "Oh, mother! Gracie Thornton is going to give a party to-morrow evening, and if I could only go." Her mother looked at her in amazement, and said: "Why, Mattie, I don't believe you want to go. Gracie Thornton belongs to a certain little set who are wealthy and dress nicely like herself." "But I don't mean to get that way. I would like to go and let them see me, help pass refreshments, something like that. Mother, I want to see their elegant house, and then I can put it in my story, to brighten it up. Don't you think you can help me?" pleaded Mattie.

Col. Thornton was a wealthy banker there, had a fine residence and grounds. Mrs. Van Wyck had taken some sewing to do for them, and this is how Mattie thought perhaps, her mother might intercede for her.

The next morning after she had gone to school her mother went over to see Mrs. Thornton what Mattie could do, telling her that she greatly desired to help in some way. Mrs. Thornton was a kind, motherly woman, loved by all who knew her. She smiled, and told her to send the child over by all means; there might be something she could do, and she could enjoy the music. Mrs. Van Wyck thanked her, and went home feeling too grateful to speak almost, knowing how pleased Mattie would be.

Mattie's wardrobe was very limited. Her mother got out her best dress, a black cashmere that she had worn two winters, mended it in one or two places, then washed and ironed a little muslin apron, and waited to tell her the good news. Mattie clapped her hands for joy when her mother told her, and was so excited she could scarcely eat her dinner.

Evening came at last. Mattie put on her black dress and muslin apron; her mother basted through all her loops, and found a pair of clean ribbon, just what she needed with her plain face, gray eyes, and brown, wavy hair. Her mother thought it at her best, and looked very pretty indeed. She kissed her good-by, and with her sisters to stay late, started for the Thornton mansion.

In her eagerness to finish her story she had thought of nothing else; but as she neared the mansion she felt terribly frightened, and some of the little guests were beginning to arrive, she was seized with the fear and trepidation. She passed by two or three parlors, but was so unnerved as if she had been a little autumn leaf rustling along the hall, she thought she would turn back, then, thinking of her story, if she could be successful how much she would do, she rallied herself, dried her eyes and hurried round to the dining-room door and was soon admitted.

Mrs. Thornton was helping her daughter receive her guests, so Mattie sat down and waited to be useful. The dining-room door was partially open, she could hear the hum of voices and peals of merry laughter; it seemed like fairyland to her. The little hostess was tastefully attired in a white muslin dress, with natural flowers; there was Gertie Manning, looking lovely in an embroidered Swiss overdress over pink silk, and Maud Leslie in a white silk with a lily, and, last but not least, Johnnie Kennington, a little brunette, in crimson silk reaching a tropical fever; and over so many more. The boys were in dress suits, with white neckties and pumps; and as they commenced to promenade through the rooms Hattie's cheeks began to burn; she felt very conscious, and wished she was at home with her mother, brother and sisters. Presently Mrs. Thornton came out and greeted her with a smile, and putting her arm around her told her to come into the parlors, as they going to dance the lancers, and asked her if she wouldn't like to see them and hear the music. She thought she would, very much. Near the door was the music stand, they were almost concealed by a bank of ferns, and Mattie sat down. Mattie sat at one end where she could see the merry throng and not be seen, and thought Mrs. Thornton also preferred this place to any other. The band was playing one of their best waltzes, and as the dancers glided in and out through the mystic maze, Mattie sat with her cheeks burning, and thrilled with rapture. The perfume of evening jessamine and tuberoses filled the air; the lights cast a very low over the happy throng; and as tax was turned over the face curtains, and the meets of roses were in every nook and corner.

After a while there was a stir in the dining-room, and Mattie went out to see what she could do. Mrs. Thornton, noticing her flushed cheeks and anxious manner, told her she could help serve refreshments, if she wished. Mattie felt greatly obliged meeting her haughty little schoolmates, wondering what they would say; but she was determined in her purpose, and went quietly along. Some of these girls looked wonderingly at her, and one or two gave her a suspicious little stare, but she didn't stop to mind them; and when the musicians took their seats again, and then there was a general hunting about, Mattie slipped quietly out and ran home.

The days passed swiftly by, school was out, and the holidays were near at hand, the store windows were full of tempting articles, wax dolls with real hair, dainty work-baskets lined with crimson silk, and some with lime silk, each with a thimble, pair of scissors, and all the equipments for an industrious little girl; and there were seldom a holiday-choice for the boys, and Johnnie had spent in the next window a pair of boots with red tops that he thought would just fit him. Any lad seen some children place, Kitty Morell, that she received; and Madge saw a story-book in the book-store window, with a picture of a happy family on the outside, sitting around a table reading by lamplight. It reminded her of their evenings at home, and she thought it would be a nice book to have.

Mattie's story was completed at last, and one morning, when she was going on an errand for her mother, she packed it in her pocket, and, stopping on her way, entered the Pioneer office. There were several gentlemen in, discussing the topics of the day. One editor came forward and asked her what she would like. She asked him if he would take a story. He began to murmur something about an "oversupply," when her slender figure and wan face attracted his attention. He took the story, telling her he had not time to read it then, but if she would leave her name he would look it over. She gave her address and left, perhaps he would be regarded as a lunatic.

Mattie and her mother were very happy, even the younger ones assumed little responsibilities, and all were as busy as bees.

Day after day passed till there were only two before Christmas. Mattie had been to the office time and time again, but no word from her story. She had almost given it up, when, one evening about dusk, as she was taking some sewing home to a lady on Summit Avenue, she thought she would try once more. There was no need to give her name, for as soon as her caper face appeared, a large envelope was handed her, and Mattie knew she had received her chance. The stores were beginning to be lighted and people were hurrying to and fro with suspicious-looking parcels; on air of mystery prevailed. No one was more mysterious than Mattie as she made her way through the bustling crowd. She was a stranger to her room, lighted her candle, and opened her letter; her hands trembled so she could scarcely read it, but it fell to her feet but two new crisp 5-dollar bills! Her happiness was unbounded; her plans could all be carried out.

And what a merry Christmas they had. Johnnie remembered her and as soon as he heard the first rooster crow, to see what Santa Claus had brought him; there was a pair of red top boots, his eyes was a pair of red tipped boots; "dat's just what I want, I'm so lucky," he said. And there was a baby house, sufficient for Amy, a new dress in the book-store window, with pieces of ribbon and ribbons and candy for them all. There was no one more pleased than Mrs. Van Wyck when she looked at her shoe, when she uttered a little cry of surprise and joy, to see what was the matter. When she examined it she found a crisp 5-dollar note in its toe. Mattie's story was copied up in tissue paper which she had spread with a little mouse. Underneath the paper a $5 bill rolled out; they all clapped their hands and danced each other their presents.

When dinner time came, their mother had also had a surprise for them. They all sat down to the table; Johnnie went into the kitchen and brought in a fine roasted turkey; and there was a mound of a snowy napkin, and there was a large frosted cake, with frosted raisins on top. They were a happy family that day, and no one in the whole town was more valued than Mattie Van Wyck, who had found out that "Where there's a will there's a way." —Chicago Ledger.

Wants His Church Subscription Back.

At a recent meeting of the Universalist parish in Augusta, Me., a big row came of the church made an angular request that the newspapers should stop printing his name. He stated that he had business pass, and he asked the society to refund to him the sum of $25, which he subscribed toward the erection and maintenance of the church building some twenty years ago. He not only got his money, and it will be strange if he does. Though the subscriber's name is not given, he is particularly described that he has in a life of nine books can hunt him down. He is said to have held the creative Federal offices almost continuously for twenty years or more. For years he was Minister to one of the European courts at a salary of $7,500 a year. Then he was Minister to South American republic at a salary of $10,000 a year. If this is not a warning against subscribing, what is it? Not a word against charitable living, surely, for if the $25 had been given away it would undoubtedly have been squandered on the donor's other income was. —Exchange.

A Mixed Compliment.

John Littlefield, who is one of the long-haired men of Aroostook, introduced himself to a young lady who was very far from being handsome. But she was very large, her eyes very sweet, in fact, she was positively homely. The young husband and Bill Nicholson on the street, and asked him:

"How do you like her?"

"I think you have done very well. She has one great advantage over you."

"What is that?"

"She displayed much better taste in selecting a partner than you did."

Bill had been thinking it over, and is quite satisfied that Littlefield meant that there is something he doesn't fit, in the compliment to his future wife.—Texas Siftings.

It Don't Pay.

"There is nothing more encouraging than the growing conviction on the part of the great mass of employers that they can have nothing to do with men who drink intoxicating liquors even in moderation. They don't look at it in many cases from a moral point of view, but simply as a matter of business. They know that those employed in certain occupations must above all things be reliable, with all their wits about them, and their nerves like steel. Drinking even moderately is incompatible with this. One extra glass has often made a man reckless who in the ordinary sense was perfectly sober. Hence all the great railway corporations are getting to insist upon their employes being not only sober men, but men who do not meddle at all with intoxicating liquors. A man drinking even the smallest quantity of liquor when on duty, would, if found out, be instantly dismissed on almost every railway on the continent. Railways can't afford to have men whose indulgence in liquor may cause the loss of life and hundreds of thousands of dollars. It don't pay."

Temperance Items.

I dont propose to instruct the physicians or contribute of my ignorance to any body, but, a good worker for temperance assures me that I can say with truth, that tobacco is excellent for a poultice to relieve intense pain. She has tried it, and speaks whereof she has felt, and now believes that the only use it is fit for has been discovered.—[Union Signal.

The evils of intemperance are forcing themselves on the attention of the British press. The London Times admits their magnitude, but can offer no remedy beyond "very stringent protection against bad and adulterated liquors." If the plague that once devastated London again visits that metropolis, the Times would favor prohibition. It would keep out the plague, if London had to be garrisoned. Some day society will see the wisdom of keeping out moral plagues.

Upon the vigilance of railroad employes the lives of many besides themselves frequently depend. And it is a wise precaution that forbids to them even the moderate use of stimulants, since he who drinks a little continually will drink too much occasionally. The great through line west from Chicago, on which the penalty of dismissal follows the slightest indulgence in alcohol, even upon a single occasion, will sooner or later be fully repaid for its vigilance through the added immunity from danger thus secured to its property and passengers.—S. S. Times.

An exchange truthfully remarks that two drinks of whiskey means a pound and a half of beef steak; two beers, a breakfast of mutton chops; one cocktail, an egg plant or head of cauliflower; "What will you take, Tom?" stands for a nice oyster stew for a whole family on Sunday morning; "Set 'em up again" means sugar in the house for a month. Solicitor pants, wood on the fire, meal in the tub, money in the purse, credit in the country, contentment in the home, clothes on the children, vigor in the baby, intelligence in the brain, and spirit in the whole constitution.

The papers are at last waking up to the fact that the saloons were among the chief agencies in inflaming the Cincinnati riot. The mayor is censured by Cincinnati papers for not closing them. They respond a harvest from the rioters. The men who buried themselves in Gatling guns and Winchester rifles, and who placed the torch to the court house, ruthlessly exposing the city to conflagration, were maddened by the liquor served out in the saloons. Property, human life, social order and staple government are as recklessly against the liquor traffic as they are foremost in whiskey than from dynamite.—[Texas Advocate.

MY LITTLE SWEETHEART.
BY MRS. EUGENIE PHILLIPS.
My little sweetheart is so fair,
Angels in Heaven they'd miss her there.
She has such eyes of wondrous hue,
A summer's sky of azure blue;
They sparkle and glow on the surface bright,
But way in their depths they are dark as night.
Her tresses brown hair hath golden gleams,
Like the latest rays of the sunset's beams;
Her cheeks are as pink as some a tender line,
And kisses fall from her lips like wine.
(), there is naught that can compare
With the ravishing smiles that linger there,
My little sweetheart, gentle and fair,
With the sun's last rays in her golden hair.

CHEWING-GUM MYSTERIES.
A Talk with a Manufacturer of the Compound.
The manufacturer of tolu chewing-gum is a cheerful tradesman, says the Indianapolis News. If you will stop into his factory he will pile you with arguments, and in a jiffy will show you that life in the auro-tolu period was without charm and civilization incomplete, that the odoriferous gum assists digestion, preserves the teeth, and prolongs life. Does it lower taxes? No, but it taxes you lower than any other luxury, and 5 cents' worth industriously circulated among your family and scrupulously preserved for second-hand will go further than a whole kit of tobacco.
"So you make gum out of old rubber shoes?" asked the reporter of the only tolu manufacturer in the city.
"Sir?" (indignantly.)
"I say, can you tell me how you make chewing-gum?"
"I certainly can not. That's the most valuable portion of my stock in trade. It cost me $300 and a year's practice to learn how to make gum. I can't afford to give away a trade secret."
"It is true, as frequently repeated, that chewing-gums are made of old rubber, dog meat, and similar delicacies?"
"If you will step into the store I will take pleasure in showing you the materials of which we make tolu gum." And certainly there were some bat'weet odors in the air, and there was no heaps of old shoes and umbrellas, and no protruding legs of putrescent porkers under the counters, or in the back yard.
"This is the foundation of all tolu chewing-gum," said the manufacturer, as he lifted from a sack of foreign flour a lump of material that looked very much like putty or thick dough. "It is a gum which we get from South America. It is the product of a tree, the sap of which, when exposed to the atmosphere solidifies and becomes just what you see here. It is controlled in the markets by a New York house, and varies in price from 30 cents to $1 per pound in the rough according to quality. Its commercial name is not known by two or three dozen persons outside of New York. I sent to a leading drug-gist there for it, but he declared there was no such substance in existence. Commonly it is known as 'tolu gum,' but there is no tolu in it. Break off a piece and chew it. Isn't it pleasant to the taste and agreeable to the teeth? There you have tolu chewing-gum without the tolu. For chewing purposes it is, in its natural state, just as satisfactory as when made up into a compound. But the gum-chewers want more than a substance to chew. They want something sweet and odoriferous. So we form a combination of this South-American gum with sugar and tolu balsam. There is the aromatic tolu. It is the product of the tolu tree of South America, and as you well know, is a stimulant used for colds and throat troubles."
Gradually the "secrets of the trade" leaked out, and all but the written recipe were in the mind of the reporter. It seems that this much-boasted gum from the tropics, which is most probably harmless, is boiled by the chewing-gum maker, strained, and all the chips and dirt removed, when the tolu and sugar are added, forming a concoction which, when sufficiently cooked, is rolled out, cut into squares, and laid aside to dry. It takes three or four days for the newly-made gum to dry out; then it is wrapped, boxed, and marketed.
The same dealer makes a white chewing-gum. This is made of paraffine and sugar. Paraffine is a production from coal oil. In appearance it is glassy white, and, as to taste, it is insipid, if nothing worse. Paraffine and sugar boiled into a broth, cooled, and put into shape, become the white wax so often seen in heart shape adorned for the market with scrap pictures.
"Who uses chewing-gum? Chiefly girls and ladies, and you would be surprised to see the fashionable people that come here for chewing-gum. I have one lady customer who buys a quarter's worth every day or two. A tobacco-chewer drains his system by constant spitting, while the gum-chewer swallows the saliva. It may be hard on the jaws, but it is good for the stomach. If it were as deadly a substance as it is reported to be there would hardly be a girl living in this town, for nearly everyone has used it in small or great quantities. Why, I sell $5,000 worth from my shop alone per year, and every druggist keeps it in stock. And why shouldn't the girls have a few pleasures. They can't smoke, drink, nor chew (tobacco). Give them gum or give them death."

THE STRICKEN SOLDIER.

Gen. Grant's Obstinate Battle with Death

New York dispatches of the morning of Sunday, April 25, reported favorable progress in Gen. Grant's case. The night had been passed fairly well, in quiet manner, at times passing his cough, and at times coughing up phlegm. The family had been with members of the family. In contradiction of the report sent out that the patient's mind was not clear, but only as separated sore throat, the physicians gave the public to understand that he suffered from epithelial cancer of a malignant type, and that the cancer had made its diagnosis doubtful. The report from the many diagnoses that have been made, the progress and extension of the disease have been predictable in the line marked out by the doctors, and the results to be expected, but not a prediction or report which has been consistent with the case has differed from the subsequent in the result of its investigation.

The bulletins telegraphed from New York on the morning of April 26 in regard to Gen. Grant's condition reported the patient as still on the mend. He had passed two good days and nights resting quietly, taking nourishment and taking his medicines at regular intervals. In the morning he dressed himself and walked about the house during the day. At one time he appeared at the windows and bowed to the people who were on the street, and at other times he drilled a military salute. Not a disturbing or discouraging feature in Grant's condition, the physicians pointed to, their claim that the disease would terminate fatally, though death might be delayed for an indefinite period.

Gen. Grant enjoyed another night's unbroken rest, and the morning of April 27 found the sufferer so far improved that the physicians gave their consent to his taking an airing in Central Park. Shortly after noon the family carriage was driven to the door. "Gen. Grant heard the footfall of wheels, and as the driver reined up the horses the sick man pulled aside the curtains and looked out for himself. Then the time-tried cough for the hundred-for-drive, Harrison, the colored footman, came to the side upon his arm, emerged from the house and mounted the carriage. A moment later the sick man was by his side, but not before the little book was in his scarf, and closely buttoned against his breast, as he always has worn it. The General carried a light cane, and, unaided, walked down the steps with a firm tread, and entered the landau he bowed and smiled as a hundred hats were lifted in salute by those who had gathered to see him walk across the sidewalk. As the General was stepping into the carriage he glanced up to the window of his son and family and good-morning. Herbert, who had mounted to his place with the driver, remarked, "Well, Father, you look like a real veteran." "Yes," said the veteran, "I feel like a veteran." The drive was a no carriage ride, the General sitting as a veteran like at the Shenandoah (Feb 19th), many people praising for him, there were hardly be time that he should appear in public.

Gen. Grant slept uninterruptedly through the night of April 28, and was reported as appearing in strength. The usual morning bulletin was issued at 10 o'clock. It was delivered through Central Park during the day. A New York dispatch says: "There are still rumors in private circles that Gen. Grant's disease has been misrepresented." Some say that he is growing, and this morning the "Herald" editorially that the hemorrhage was caused by the cancer, and was disappointed that the cancer was not discovered. Said his doctors are afraid it, and that Dr. Douglas, who is a specialist in throat diseases, has not been allowed to see the patient, and that the family are sharply following.

A continued improvement in Gen. Grant's condition was noted in the New York dispatches of April 29. His three physicians held a consultation and examined his throat, which they found to be much better than when last seen. The throat cleared out in his carriage, and later walked down to the parlor, returning not in the least fatigued. A gentleman, just arrived from England, presented himself with a card, upon which Private Secretary Bell written his sympathies and good wishes. The card was presented to the sick man, and he seemed to be pleased that this tender thought. POLITICAL.

Friends of the administration say that the reason why the New York World attacker the State Department is that its proprietor made one request of the President. That was that Chris Gibson, of St. Louis, should be appointed Minister to Berlin, that the President had decided to make the appointment, but that the World interfered and secured the place for McIlvaine.

The Postmaster General, in a letter to John H. Oberly, promises to give his attention, at a date as early as is convenient, to the charges of active and offensive partisanship brought against ex-U. S. Minister Bowker, Postmaster at Anacosta, Md.

Washington dispatch: "The revelation concerning James M. Morgan, of South Carolina, who was appointed Consul General at Boston Australia the other day, was a surprise to administration circles. Morgan was an ardent Blaine man, and published a pamphlet in New York during the campaign advocating Blaine on account of his protective policy. Nothing was known of this when the appointment was made. The appointment was tendered at the instance of Mr. Dawson, proprietor of the Charleston News and Courier, who asked it as a special favor, and said it was the only thing he had to ask of the administration. Besides this, Mr. Morgan's papers were signed by Senators Butler and Hampton, a number of Congressmen, of Maryland, Hon. R. T. Merrick, and other prominent Democrats. Senator Butler said that he had always known Morgan as a Democrat, and was greatly surprised at his action, and had written in favor of Blaine."

Gen. A. R. Lawton, of Georgia, has declined to accept the Russian minister.

The Illinois Legislature, as a body, declined the invitation of the Illinois Central Road to make an excursion to New Orleans, but there are indications that many Senators and members will personally accept the offer.

POLYGAMY'S DEATH-BLOW.

The Supreme Court Renders a Decision in the Case of Rudger Clawson.

In a Carefully Prepared Opinion the Ruling Is Against the Plaintiff on Both Points Raised.

(Washington dispatch.)

A decision has been rendered by the Supreme Court in the polygamy case of Rudger Clawson against the United States, brought here by writ of error from the Supreme Court of Utah. Clawson, living in Utah, was indicted for polygamy at the April term of 1884 of the District Court of the Territory, and after trial found guilty and sentenced to a term of $800 and four months' imprisonment. He appealed to the Supreme Court of the Territory, and the third judgment affirmed the judgment of the District Court, but the judgment of the Supreme Court on the ground that the grand and petit juries by which he was indicted and tried were illegally constituted. The alleged illegality in the impanneling of the grand jury consisted in the exclusion upon challenge of persons who believed a man had a right to have more than one unlawful wife, and who would not be able to find the case of the petit jury in the drawing of names from a jury box, which was not published. The jury box of 320 had been exhausted by the time the case came on for trial.

This court, in a carefully prepared opinion by Justice Bradlefield, decides against the plaintiff on both points raised by the court. Section 5 of the Edmunds act provides:

"And in any prosecution for bigamy, polygamy, or the living or cohabiting with more than one woman, no person shall be competent to testify or give evidence, or be compelled to testify or give evidence, before any grand jury or in any trial, hearing, or other proceeding, except in a prosecution or proceeding for a crime or misdemeanor other than bigamy, polygamy, or unlawful cohabitation, and no evidence shall be given or any question asked which shall tend to show that any witness has committed or been guilty of any act or offense which is not the subject of the prosecution or inquiry, or which may tend to expose any witness to a prosecution or forfeiture of any character, or which may tend to disgrace such witness or render such witness infamous, except that any witness who may be called to testify in any such prosecution or proceeding for unlawful cohabitation may be required to give evidence touching the fact of such cohabitation, and shall not be excused from so testifying or giving evidence upon the ground that such testimony may tend to disgrace such witness or render such witness infamous."

This court holds that the proceedings to impanel the Third Jury which finally convicted for one of the offenses named in the indictment, and the subsequent trial of the case, were in strict accordance with the provisions of the act of June 23, 1874, relating to courts and juries of territories in the Territory of Utah, the names in the jury box of 320 jurors provided for by that section, were exhausted, the jury being only partly impanelled, the District Court may possess a venire to the United States Marshal for the Territory to summon jurors from the body of the Judicial District, and that the jury thus impanelled from persons thus summoned. It is held that the record shows no error, and the judgment of the court below is accordingly affirmed.

HISTORICAL SOCIETY.

Grand Closing Entertainment at the Parlors of the Bridge Street House.

Banquet and Program.

On Tuesday evening, April 14th, the Society adjourned from the parlors of Mr. and Mrs. L. E. Allen, for two weeks, to meet at the pleasant parlors and dining room of the Bridge Street house, and participate in the closing banquet and program of the season.

At 6.30 p. m. the commodious dining room was found occupied by the members and friends of the society, all taking a lively interest in the elegantly prepared festivities as arranged by the ladies of the society. After all had supplied themselves with cake, coffee, rolls, sandwiches and toothpicks, they were seated in the parlors to listen to the well prepared and interesting program.

Miss Aggie Miller and A. D. Bradbeer opened the exercises with a beautiful duet. The select reading by H. Lee Iddings was very good indeed. Vocal duet by F. A. Smith and A. T. Washburn.

The paper of the evening prepared and read by Mrs. Harsha deserves more praise than the writer can find words to express. It was indeed excellent and worthy of publication in any first class newspaper or magazine, and was so considered by all present.

Quartette; Mrs. Clark, Mrs. Hines, Messrs. Bradbeer and Carlstein, sung very nicely and was appreciated by all.

After an intermission of ten minutes W. A. Smith and Mrs. Hines entertained the society with a very nice vocal duet.

Miss Cochran's select reading was well worthy of praise.

The guitar duet by Miss Loveday and A. T. Washburn was a rare treat to all present, and not only well executed but very pretty.

Major Green's remarks, as president of the society, in his usual pleasing manner made a good part of the program, declaring the past session the most prosperous and interesting of any previous year.

The exercises were closed by an instrumental solo by Miss Aggie Miller, and she did nicely. The society were then by motion adjourned to meet in October next; place will be noticed in due time.

FRED. A. SMITH, Secretary.

Mrs. F. G. Hines soprano, Mrs. E. M. Clark alto, Mr. A. D. Bradbeer tenor, and Dr. J. A. Carlstein bass, gave a selection at the Historical Tuesday evening, which has received much favorable mention. It had been previously given at one of the society's meetings, and was liked so well that its repetition was requested.

Mrs. H. S. Harsha seems to have a rare faculty of making innocent humorous hits on people with her pen. The paper read at the historical is an instance. Her literary work bears evidence of native wit reinforced with careful training, which enables her to catch passing humor and clothe it in the best language.

The ladies of the Society under whose general supervision the very complete banquet was planned and served deserve much praise from all who were favored with seats at the loaded tables.

The executive committee of the society have provided excellent entertainments all winter.

Charlevoix Improvement Association.

At the village hall last Saturday evening, this association completed its organization and elected officers as follows:

President—Byron Soe.
First Vice President—W. A. Smith.
Second Vice President—Robert Miller.
Recording Secretary—C. J. Strang.
Financial Secretary—B. Suffield.
Treasurer—Albert E. Mason.

President Soe appointed the following standing committees:

Executive Committee—J. M. Eaton, A. D. Cruickshank, and J. L. Hurd.

Corresponding Committee—H. Lee Iddings, W. A. Brown, and C. Y. Cook.

Reception Committee — Fred W. Mayne, L. D. Bartholomew, M. J. Stockman, R. Cooper, Geo. W. Crouter, B. W. Miller, S. M. See, W. C. Newman, E. M. Clark, H. Berdan.

The constitution and bylaws define the objects and methods of government of the association, in about the same manner as societies generally. The corresponding committee are to advertise the business advantages of the village, and answer all correspondence in relation thereto; and the reception committee are to meet those coming here and endeavor to induce the investment of capital. Any person interested in the welfare of the town may become a member by signing the constitution and bylaws, and paying one dollar a year membership fee.

The committees are now at work, and letters of inquiry are already being received.

The next regular meeting will be held at the village hall Monday evening, May 11th.

Newspapers of To-Day.

People generally, and even those who may be termed steady readers and close observers, have but a faint conception of the magnitude and influence the press of this country has attained. From a careful examination of the advance pages of the 1885 edition of the American Newspaper Directory, issued May 1st, by Geo. P. Rowell & Co., of New York, it appears that there are 14,147 newspapers and periodicals published in the United States and Canada; of these the United States has 12,973, an average of one paper for every 3,867 persons. In 1884 the total number of newspapers was less by 823 than at present, and while the gain this year is not so marked as in some previous years, it is still considerable. Kansas shows the greatest increase, the number being 78, while Illinois follows with a gain of 77. It is curious to notice that New York, the scene of so much political activity during the last campaign, should have only about one third as many new papers as the State of Pennsylvania. As an index to the comparative growth and prosperity of different sections of the country, especially the Territories, the number of new papers forms an interesting study, and may well occupy the attention of the curious.

New York World: Well, the Democrats are in power and have already scattered these falsehoods to the winds. Honest people who were really misled and deceived by the persistency of these republican charges have had an opportunity to see that the democratic administration means civil service reform, business revival, increasing employment of labor, economy and honesty in expenditures, greater regard for the rights of the people and an elevation of the standard of public honor. They find democrats fitter to rule than republicans, and the southern citizens as true and loyal to the union and the constitution as northern citizens. The elections mean that honest, conscientious men who wronged the democracy by crediting the republican slanders are now anxious to do reparation and to perform a public duty by putting democrats into power wherever deserving candidates of that party ask their suffrages.

The Tradesman is out with a new dress of type. It has all along been one of the cleanest, most business-like papers in the state, and indications now are that it means to stay at the front.

We have already come down to the five-cent basis. The time will come when we will be inevitably compelled to descend to the honest penny of the cold and calculating East. The chivalrous sentiment which dishains the settlement of values varying on either side of the California "bit" will also have to be discarded.—The Inglenide, San Francisco.

A woman, whose son had been ruined by dissipation, was fined $5 in Hamilton, Ont., the other day, with the alternative of ten days in jail, because she took her before a saloon and asked God to curse the liquor traffic.

Jigging for Frost Fish.

Jigging for frost fish is now the sport here. At this season the fish crowd into the shallow water along the shores of the Thames. When the first ice makes the frost-fish jigger is out for business. He needs no bait, but, knowing the habits of the fish, relies wholly upon stratagem. He provides himself with two sticks two feet in length. Upon the end of one he ties a cluster of oak leaves, and at the end of the other he fastens a sharp hook, making a miniature gaff. He takes his hushed stick and puts it down in from eight inches to a foot and a half of water and begins to oscillate it patiently, and the frost fish comes to it as pet dogs or cats come to meat. They swim slowly beneath it, rubbing against the leaves and expressing signs of gratefulness at finding such shelter, when the jig is deftly lowered alongside of them and they are jerked out of the water with a suddenness that must astonish even a fish. The fish do not seem to get frightened, but continue to swoon beneath the leaves and be hooked up as long as the jigger has patience to pull them. In this way bushels of into eels are caught annually from the Thames.—Norwich (Conn.) Bulletin.

DANGER.

Do you know that you are liable to attacks of dyspepsia and all kinds of stomach derangement? Yes, worse still, to that result of kidney and liver disorder that is known as diabetes or possibly bright's disease. They are often fatal and that in a very short time. Loss of appetite, sour stomach, dimness of vision, dizziness, pains in side and back and many others are but the symptoms of disease. Be wise in time. Parmelee's Dyspepsia, Diabetes, Kidney and Liver Cure is the sovereign remedy. Large bottles $1.00.

Sold by Dr. G. W. Crouter, Charlevoix, and Crouter & Harris, Ironton.

COUGHS AND COLDS

Are the inevitable results of sudden changes in the weather. Immediate attention should be given them so that they may not become established and result in bronchitis, congestion, inflammation or even consumption. Hamilton's Cough Balsam soothes the irritated membrane, and assists in removing phlegm and mucus, that by its adhesion to the membranes, causes violent coughing. Great relief is received by even those in the last stages of consumption. In croup and whooping cough it is unequaled. Price 25 and 50 cents per bottle.

Sold by Dr. G. W. Crouter, Charlevoix, and Crouter & Harris, Ironton.

SCIENTIFIC INVESTIGATION

Has proved that nothing but a direct application can cure the many forms of piles, that so trouble all classes of humankind. In all forms of piles, immediate and careful attention is needed. By faithfully following the direction given with each box of Parmelee's Pile Suppositories a cure is certain. Warranted to give immediate relief. Price 50c per box.

Sold by Dr. G. W. Crouter, Charlevoix, and Crouter & Harris, Ironton.

IN THE SPRING

Nature intends that the human body should be relieved of the heavy, stagnant humors which always accumulate during the winter months, and the very best medicine for accomplishing this object is Parmelee's Blood Purifier. It will cleanse and purify the system and drive out all humors and impurity safely and quickly. Price $1.00 for large bottle.

Sold by Dr. G. W. Crouter, Charlevoix, and Crouter & Harris, Ironton.

The Chicago Daily News

Has the Largest Daily Circulation in America.

In issue for the year 1884 averaged 135,178 copies daily, and it is now regularly printing over 150,000 papers a day.

The magnitude of this unequaled circulation is best appreciated when it is said that it exceeds the circulations of all other Chicago dailies combined. Taking from the three standard newspaper directories—Ayer & Son's Annual, Rowell's Directory and Hubbard's Directory—the quotations which most nearly represent the actual circulations of the Chicago press, the following diagram correctly illustrates their relative positions as to extent of circulation.

From these figures it appears that the circulation of The Chicago Daily News exceeds the combined circulations of all the other Chicago dailies by 12,872 copies daily. The reason for this phenomenal success are obvious:

THE CHICAGO DAILY NEWS

is a complete newspaper in all the details that go to make up a first-class journal. It is a member of the Associated Press and is the only 2 cent paper in the West that possesses this first essential to a complete news service. In addition, it has its own private wire (by lease from the Western Union Telegraph Co.) connecting its Chicago office with New York and Washington, at both of which points it has its own news bureaus. THE CHICAGO DAILY NEWS prints ALL the news.

It is an independent paper. It recognizes the utility of political parties as means for the accomplishment of proper ends, but it declines to regard any mere party as a fit subject for unquestioning adherence. It exerts the patronage of intelligent, thoughtful, honest people who love country more than party.

THE CHICAGO DAILY NEWS

is a "short and to the point" paper. It believes that newspaper reading is but an element of the day, not its chief business. It accordingly leaves to the "blanket sheets" the monopoly of tiresome and worthless amplification. It seeks to say all that the reader should care to read, and to say it in the shortest possible manner. It is a daily paper for busy people.

It is a clean paper, fit for the family circle. It is a cheap paper—2 cents per day, 12 cents per week, 50 cents per month, $6.00 per year. Sold by all news dealers throughout the Northwest. Mailed to any address, post paid, upon receipt of price.

Where the facilities of a daily mail are not enjoyed THE CHICAGO WEEKLY NEWS is recommended as "the next best." It is a large 8 page, 64 column paper, carefully made up to meet all the varying needs of the family circle. It is the largest "dollar weekly" in America. It is equal to the best.

The following new star schedule has been arranged. Elk Rapids to Eastport and Charlevoix—Leave Elk Rapids daily except Sundays at 1:30 p. m. and arrive at Eastport by 6 p. m. Leave Eastport at 6:30 a. m. and arrive at Elk Rapids by 11 a. m.; leave Eastport Tuesdays, Thursdays, and Saturdays at 6 a. m., and arrive at Charlevoix by 11:40 a. m.; leave Charlevoix Tuesdays, Thursdays, and Saturdays at 1 p. m., and arrive at Eastport by 7 p. m.

The season is late this year. There is as yet only a little done in the construction line, including the lumber cargo, because the "ornithe" are still closed, and the present season of upper lake navigation bids fair to be the latest in any season within the last thirty-one years—since a record has been kept. The latest so far on record is 1881, when navigation at the straits opened May 4. The earliest was in 1878, on March 14. The average average, for 18 years, between April 22 and 30. Marine insurance runs from April till November, both months included.

"Double the circulation and twice the amount of reading matter of any other paper in the county," is a bold claim for the Sentinel to make. A larger circulation we admit,—perhaps a hundred or two,—but not double by a long ways. As to quantity of reading matter, a careful measurement will show their claim to lack nearly twenty feet in length of column,—equal to over ten columns of the Sentinel. The JOURNAL will not attempt to compete in size with any paper at any time, but we do invite a critical comparison of quantity or quality of purely home news any week,—not of all that appears on the local page, but of strictly home news.

Mrs. Powers and the other stock holders of the Northern Manufacturing Co., at Boyne Falls, have secured a trust deed of all the property belonging to the corporation at that place to Lester J. Rindge, of this city, and Chas. Root, of Detroit, who will carry on the business to the best of their ability, realize on the assorts as fast as possible, and distribute the proceeds among the creditors pro rata. The property comprises a saw mill, planing mill and handle factory, stocks of logs, lumber and handles, and a stock of general merchandise. The raw material will be manufactured as fast as possible, and while the store will be re-enforced with such goods as find a ready sale, every effort will be made to close the whole matter out before a year has elapsed. The total liabilities are $6,500, distributed among creditors at Grand Rapids, Detroit, and Chicago. The aggregate assets nearly approach the liabilities in value, and may be closed out so as to leave a margin for the stockholders, although the latter possibility depends entirely upon the future improvement in business.—[Tradesman.

Mr. Charles Spaulding died of typhoid pneumonia, at the residence of his parents, in Elk Rapids, last Sunday afternoon at 3 o'clock, aged about 18 years. He was prostrated on the Monday morning previous, but rallied sufficient to give a sugar party to his friends which had been planned for Monday evening. From that time he failed steadily and rapidly until Sunday. He was a member of the band, and a regular attendant at the high school. The principal of the school was granted permission to decorate the grave, and with the assistance of the scholars thereby fixed it with flowers, and scattered them liberally over the casket after it was lowered into the flower-lined vault. He was a close student, and intended to enter the contest for a cadetship at West Point. Deceased was a nephew of Miss L. Spaulding, and a cousin of Miss Flora Nelson, of Charlevoix.

TRIXIE'S LETTERS.

BY JENNIE S. JUDSON.

(Letter No. 1.)

JUNE 13.

It is just one week to-day, Cecil dear, since you and I stood like two Niobes on the steps of dear old St. Agnes, bidding each other a sad farewell. A week, and yet the shadow of that parting has not left me.

Not one adventure connected with my journey have I to relate, although my romantic soul was constantly on the alert for anything that savored of sentiment.

Major Pierson met me at the depot with a carriage and horses, and as soon as I caught sight of his kind, fatherly face I recalled the many times I had seen it in my father's house in Dorset. His greeting was so cordial, and he bent upon me so kind and tender an expression, I felt sure at once that the tie between us would be nearer and the more legal one of guardian and ward.

My first acquaintance with the family was made at the supper-table, whither I was conducted by Miss Pierson, the Major's maiden sister, and little Bess, the five-year-old pet of the household. I was presented in turn to Miss Ida Crane, the Major's niece, a beautiful girl, who makes her home here; Mr. Jack Pierson, the younger son, now at home for his college vacation; and Mr. Frank Pierson, the elder son, also at home, convalescing from a recent illness.

"So this is our new little sister, is it?" said Mr. Frank Pierson, as I was introduced last to him. "Miss Beatrix, I hope you may be happy in your new home."

"Little sister," indeed! My eyes flashed up a glance of resentment at this patriarch, who evidently regarded me as just free from swaddling clothes. An amused glance in response proved that he understood.

Jack, and I soon struck up a friendly alliance, and as I bade the family an early good-night I was with the happy thought that I would find congenial companionship in my new home.

"Miss Beatrix," cried a sweet little voice next morning, as I looked out from my window at the flower-yard below, "come down and see the diamonds on the flowers."

So, tying my hair loosely back, I ran down to join the little fairy below.

After a short but delightful survey of the flowers, Bessie conceived the brilliant idea of converting my travel-feuding head into a miniature flower garden.

"You have beautiful hair, Miss Beatrix," she said, giving me a vigorous pull with a hairbrush as she spoke; "but I don't like your name; it twists my little tongue.

"Then don't say it, darling; call me Trixie instead."

"May Brover Jack call you Twixie, too?" was the next unexpected attack.

"Oh! yes, I suppose, if he adds on a miss," was my careless reply.

"But Brover Frank may call you Twixie without no miss at all, mayn't he?" looking earnestly down in my eyes.

I caught her in my arms with a kiss. "Oh, never mind about Brother Frank," I cried. "I am only his little sister; so it can make no difference what he calls me."

The loud peal of the breakfast bell so startled me at this juncture that I rose hurriedly to my feet.

"How careless!" I cried, putting my hand to my head; "now I shall be late for breakfast, and my first impression too."

While standing in this graceful attitude the rustling of a newspaper caused me to glance up, and there, looking at me from the arbor, I saw the handsome, laughing face of Frank Pierson.

"All hail to Aurora," he cried; "fair goddess of the morning! accept, I pray, this additional tribute to your charms," handing me a spray of woodbine as he spoke.

"Oh! is that you, Brover Frank?" cried traitorous little Bess. "I had forgot you was there."

I felt prepared at this point to do or say anything absurd. For twice in the space of twenty-four hours had I been laughed at by this very superior young man, and in that quiet, self-confident sort of way that is particularly exasperating.

"Do you like our flower-garden, Miss Beaumont?" he asked, as we started toward the house.

"I can't say that I do," I answered shortly, "I am not especially fond of flowers."

"Beg pardon," he cried, "but I thought you were, judging from the profusion with which you use them," taking a laughing survey of my poor, silly head.

This was too much, and before I knew I had answered with a flash of temper, "Indeed, sir, what you think is a matter of the very slightest importance to me," and turned angrily away from him.

He made no reply, but as I hastened toward the house I heard him murmur with an irrepressible laugh, "Ophelia in the mad scene," with an accent on the "mad" too, Cecil. I wonder if I looked like poor, crazed Ophelia.

Not once did I glance toward him during breakfast, and shortly afterward I ascended the stairs to have a comfortable cry. This had barely subsided when Miss Pierson came to beg me to go and amuse myself in the library, for she was busy and the gentlemen absent on the plantation.

I accepted gladly, and was soon aroused from my depression by the sight of a splendid Steinway, and row after row of attractive books. After playing all our favorites, among them that lovely Moonlight Sonata, I unconsciously myself in a deep window-seat to read. "Twas a languid summer morning, and the droning of the bees, and the babble of a little brook lulled me into a state of blissful unconsciousness. How long this happy condition had lasted I have no idea, but when I finally unclosed my heavy eyes, "twas to find my head softly cushioned on the sofa pillow, and the curtains on the room drawn as to screen me from the sunlight. Indescribably resting my eyes I saw sitting not five feet from me, his head thrown back on the purple velvet of the chair, his eyes intent on a book, that very ubiquitous person, Mr. Frank Pierson. Do you think I rose gracefully, thanked him for services rendered, and made my exit from the room?

No, you are mistaken. Instead, I gave an angry little jump, confronting him like a young tigress. How ashamed I am now when I remember it! But think what a silly spectacle I had presented, sound asleep, and with my mouth wide open.

"I might have spared you the trouble of acting as my guard. Mr. Pierson," I said, frigidly, "had I known that in reclining here I was intruding upon your domain."

"Pardon me," he answered, quietly. "I seem destined to offend. Let me explain. In passing through this room, I found you asleep in the window, and so curiously posed that you might easily have fallen out. Common kindness alone demanded that I should watch over you. If there is an intruding it is on my part, and I leave you to the sole enjoyment of this room," saying which he left.

I was all repentance in a moment. My impulse was to follow his steps on the spot, but it suddenly died; for, as he ascended the steps, I heard him sing, with direct allusion to my morning's garden coiffure, "Make me no gaudy chaplet."

Jack and Bess and I took a lovely row on the lake this afternoon. We returned so late that I only escaped Miss Pierson's censure for my tardy arrival in the parlor (where an entertainment was being given in my honor) by appearing in a handsome costume, and as gracefully as I could.

I did so enjoy my first evening "out," Cecil.

Once during its course, as I waited on the moonlit gallery for my partner to bring me an ice, I saw Frank Pierson standing near me. He looked pale and weary, and seemed quite oblivious of my presence.

"Something in his melancholy attitude struck upon my conscience. And that unpleasant little monitor whispered, "Is this your gentleman to apologize? now is your opportunity to make it. Be brave and do your duty."

Conquering my pride, but with faltering footsteps approached the unconscious figure.

"I have come to make you an apology, Mr. Pierson," I said, even downcast and cheek blushing. "I have been childishly rude to you twice to-day; but I am sorry now, and hope you will see it to forgive me."

For a moment there was no reply, then, as I still my receive my pardon, I looked up, but only to meet an expression of countenance so strange, so inexplicable that my eyes quickly fell before it. And when he interrogated, coldly and almost scornfully, "May I ask your motive, Miss Beaumont, for this condescending act?" Was it to obtain a balm for self-wounded pride, or through a sincere desire to atone?" my spirit rose in indignant pride, and I turned to leave, saying, with bitterness—

"I regret that the effect which this apology has cost me has been wasted on one who cannot discern a true motive from a false one."

"Stay, Miss Beaumont!" he cried, with an entire change of manner, "until I beg your pardon. I only asked that question to try you. Now I have fully indemnified myself for anything you may have said, have I not?" with a frank laugh. "Only forgive me and let us be friends," extending his hand with so cordial and smiling an air that I could not resist, and so made a compact of friendship on the spot.

Two months and a reconciliation in one day! I know the idea will amuse you.

I like my new home, Cecil, and all are kind to me. Think of me dear, as being as happy as I can be without you, and compensate me for that lack by a long and early letter. Your loving friend, BEATRIX BEAUMONT.

(Letter No. 2.)

JULY 2.

If this letter seems a little blue, Cecil, dear, please attribute the fact to physical weakness. When I am strong again, I shall be your "old, lighthearted Trixie." I have been sick of late. Yes, really sick, for the first time in my healthy life; and since I know nothing short of the rest of the whole matter will satisfy you, I shall tell you "all the very beginning."

Don't smile, please, because this recital begins with the name of one, mention of whom filled most of my last letter. An explanation of matters cannot be made without it.

The reconciliation spoken of in my last letter seemed so complete that I looked forward to a happy life. "My rose is without a thorn," I thought, as more than a week afterward I sat reading "Coriolanus" in the library. While this pleasantly engaged, Mr. Frank Pierson strolled carelessly in, and requested that he might become my fellow student. I readily acquiesced in the plan, and began straightway to render myself a little tyrant, making him hunt out words and verbs ad infinitum, and laughing at his slightest mistake.

For a week our little pleasure boat sailed on this tranquilly, when one fated morning it struck upon a reef, and being sadly injured, was deserted from that hour.

"I am ashamed of Corinne," I said hotly, on the morning in question. "She confesses her love for Oswald again, before he has uttered one syllable of his for her."

"Don't be too severe, Miss Beatrix," said Mr. Pierson, provokingly. "Perhaps she couldn't help it. Who knows but one brief sun just such a handsome, irresistible lady as—excuse me, modest forbids that I proceed. Can you blame her if he was?"

I was silly enough to flush at this saucy insinuation; but just as a laughing retort rose to my lips, a servant announced that Mr. Keeblar awaited me in the parlor, and I arose to leave.

Mr. Pierson's brow darkened at the announcement, and as I threw down my book, he remarked with sarcasm: "Why not let us adopt that sweet and gentle youth, Miss Beaumont. His visits have become daily now, and the weather is warm. Would be a great economy of trouble for him."

"Nothing would suit me better," I answered gayly, as I stepped into the hall.

Mr. Keeblar is very wise and very pleasant, Cecil. He lives on the next plantation, and often comes to take me to ride.

All thought of the French lesson had escaped my mind the next morning, as arrayed in my riding habit I stumbled into the library to await my escort. Sitting near the window, I began to hum "Come O'er the Water, Charlie," forgetting how suggestive the words were to the occasion, when Mr. Pierson came into the room. It gave a sinister significance to a glance that my cheeks grew red as a peony at once.

"What a pity Charlie isn't o'er the water now," he said, mockingly, "to see and hear you. Do you know or what I am reminded as I see you thus?" and he read from the book in his hand the passage, "Coriana waited at her window for Oswald's coming. Her face was filled with eager excitement, and his name was often upon her lips." "Is not the picture true?" with such sarcastic emphasis that I was stung to the quick.

"I know just how unmoldesly you consider me, Mr. Pierson," I said, rising haughtily; "but you might have spared your fine perceptions this rude shock had you not stolen noiselessly into the room." Rather arrogant, was I not, Cecil?

He paled visibly beneath my scornful words, but only answered in a quiet tone, "I had no all-engrossing thought to make me to forget that this was the hour we have usually devoted to French, Miss Beaumont. Pardon me that I remembered when you did not."

Truly I had forgotten the French lesson quite, and stood dumb and convicted, while he put his French book on the shelf, saying, "There will be no further need for me to act Corinne at present, since I have her prototype always before me," and then he left the room.

He was gone to the city for three days after that, and came back looking worn and pale, and with an air of depression about him.

Bess and I were wandering aimlessly around that afternoon, for Miss Crane and Miss Pierson were off on a shopping expedition; Jack and Major Pierson away, and we were lonely. The clank of a boat-chain drew our attention as we strolled near the lake, and we found Mr. Pierson just starting for a row.

"Oh! take us too, Brover Frank," cried Bessie.

He started at the sound of her voice, but quickly turned and set her in the boat, saying, "Of course I will take you little one."

"Miss Twixie, too! You mustn't forget Miss Twixie."

"I'll hardly do that," he murmured, as he took my reluctant hand, for nothing but fear of a scene with Bessie could induce me to accept.

We were very quiet after our start. I had never known Mr. Pierson to be so abstracted; but we passed a colony of water-lilies Bessie cried out: "The lilies! the lilies! Do, Miss Twixie, get me some."

I leaned eagerly over the side to grasp one as we shot by, but it was too far, and I failed.

"Let me turn the boat among them," said Mr. Pierson; "it is rather dangerous to dip from side so much."

An evil spirit took possession of me at these words, and, without replying, I made another scoop at the coveted lily. The boat gave a sudden lurch, and little Bess and I were thrown out into the water.

I caught the little one as we sank, and, when we rose again, had her safe with all the energy of desperation. She was taken from me, and in a short time I felt myself pillowed and covered to the boat.

My poor little Bessie lay there across a seat, white-faced and silent, and, with an agonized pang, I realized in what evil influence she had sunned.

Bitter tears filled my eyes as I took the little darling in my arms, and when I noticed the deep pallor the blue veins lent to her delicate brow, I imploring him in passionate accents to forgive me, and asked tearfully why he had rescued me from a watery grave, its well as a good deed, prompted by caprice.

"Because I was ashamed of the contemptible act you had committed. Once we had been friends, and I had confided to you my hopes, and you had stolen noiselessly upon me, and, in a fit of revenge, sought to ruin my prospects. Rather arrogant, was I not, Cecil?

He paled visibly beneath my scornful words, but only answered in a quiet tone, "I had no all-engrossing thought to make me to forget that this was the hour we have usually devoted to French, Miss Beaumont. Pardon me that I remembered when you did not."

I had a right so to feel, Cecil, for had he not saved my life? But to what purpose was it, if he still cherished towards me a feeling that has been trembling on my lips for days.

Listen.—He was sitting alone as I entered, and, throwing myself on the seat beside him, I caught his hand and cried, "Major Pierson," I cried impetuously, "if I asking you something very near my heart, you will not refuse, will you?"

A sudden, fond movement, by which I was drawn close to his side, gave me encouragement to proceed, as I laid my head upon his shoulder. "I have a very dear friend in Hollewest. Can you not spare me to make her a visit?"

"No, Trixie," after a moment came the reply; "do not expect such a sacrifice from me, for I cannot give you up," and Frank Pierson stands resolutely from my side to the door, where he stood in the shimmering moonlight.

Startled, for a moment, out of all my coquetry, I stood motionless, and then I said, proudly:

"You have taken an unfair advantage of me, Mr. Pierson. I do not wish to let me pass."

"Forgive me, Beatrix," he cried, passionately, as he put out a detaining hand. "Do not leave me, I beg. I have been for days the prey to a harassing fear; to-night I am determined to be relieved from its suspense, no matter how bitter the certainty may be.

"Tell me truly," lowering his voice to an intense whisper, "do you really care for Charlie Keeblar?"

For a moment I was silent, and then I answered mockingly, in his words and brought a glad enlightenment to my heart.

"Yes, Mr. Pierson; I do really care for Mr. Keeblar. I consider him one of the most entertaining gentlemen I have ever met."

"And that is not the highest light in which you regard him either, Beatrix," he answered, with a sigh.

"Indeed it is," I said, gayly, adding, in a low tone, "I'm sometimes also when I regard in a brighter and better light."

"Some one else?" wearily. "Ah, well, what does it matter, since he is all my rival?"

"He is not your rival," I said, with clouded eyes.

"He is, Beatrix, if he loves you," was the quiet reply.

"He loves me," I said, in an exultant tone; "still he is not your rival.

"Beatrix, you torture me; tell me, I beg, what do you mean?"

Again I was for a moment silent, then at last vouchsafe to raise my eyes. I found his fit with so rare a tenderness, and bent so earnestly upon me that I knew my secret was alone safe with him, and that I should have to yield at last. "Darling!" he cried, as he drew me toward him, "I thought your heart was given to another." Then, with a sigh, "Is it not your rival, while my own heart whispers, 'He loves her very truly.'"

We were happy, Cecil, in proportion to the jealousy and suspense we both had experienced. How could we have been so blind? And I pointed my point at last, Cecil, for in two weeks I am to be with you for a brief visit, and then I will tell you a thousand things that feeble medium, my pen, refuses to convey. Good-by, my Cecil, until then.

Your fond and happy TRIXIE.

RUSSIA'S CURT REPLY.

De Giers Refuses to Talk Further About the Penjdeh Incident. Duplicity of Turker.

(Cable dispatch from London.)

The Russian reply to the communication sent to M. de Giers through Sir Edward Thornton yesterday, after the receipt of Sir Peter Lumsden's supplementary report on the battle of March 30 has just been received. M. de Giers replies coldly that Russia declines to enter upon any further discussion of the Penjdeh incident.

It is reported at St. Petersburg that the general staff are in favor of allowing Gen. Komaroff to act at his own discretion, and M. de Giers to interfere.

A letter from Baku confirms the fact of the battle of Penjdeh, and states that the Afghan force consisted of 1,000 men. The writer, who had been with Sir Peter Lumsden, but who left him when the battle was fought, states the Russians throughout the winter had been trying to excite and irritate the Afghans, and only Sir Peter Lumsden's influence prevented bloodshed long ago. Col. Alikhanof arrived in Merv on the 20th of November, before the boundary commission had arrived, and a battle with the Afghans was narrowly avoided then. Reports also been received that in the battle of Penjdeh the Afghans lost twenty men, while on the front of the fighting not one Russian was killed. It is reported that Alikhanof offered a ransom of 100 tomans (about $700) for the bodies of the British officers with the Afghan force.

A dispatch from Constantinople yesterday gives the diplomatic situation in Turkey, and states that Turkey has spent the Turkish Loan, and Robert Pasha, head of the Turkish Finance Ministry, to avoid the censorship of the press, has resigned. The reason for this resignation was said to Athens and transmitted thence by telegraph to London. It says that the mission of Edhem Pasha, who has been here constantly since January last, was to find the British Government into a belief that Turkey was disposed to be on friendly terms with England and to seek and follow her advice in all unpleasant complications. Hobart Pasha whose former reputation as a gallant admiral of the British navy made him a valuable tool for this purpose, was sent to Edhem Pasha to strengthen the blind. Hobart Pasha was intoxicated with the delivery of certain presents to the Queen and Prince of Wales, accompanied by the customary assurances of distinguished consideration, etc., which may mean a great deal or nothing. All the time work of diplomacy was going on, Turkey was being drawn from direst to last by Edhem Pasha.

ABDURRAHMAN KHAN.

The Amiret of Afghanistan.

Ameer Abdurrahman Khan was born in 1830. He is the eldest son of Afzal Khan, and is thus a grandson of Dost Mahomed, who ruled Afghanistan till his death in 1863, and perhaps to the late Shir Ali, who was deposed and died during his 2nd invasion of 1879, and who died soon afterward in exile. When Shere Ali was recognized by the English, Abdurrahman, who had spent a long exile in the Turkish Ameer of Bokhara, took refuge in those countries until the Russians had so used the Oxus, which had then not yet been adopted as a boundary, that he thought it best to be on the spot, however, by the persecuting spite of Shere Ali and Yakoob, who had seized his mother, with his sister, and detained them many years a prisoner at Cashkar, and who compelled the Ameer of Bokhara to deny him an abode in that state. Abdurrahman was fain to put himself under the protection of the Russians; then gradually advancing their conquests in Turkestan, and irritate the Afghans, he was at last generous enough to give him a pension of 25,000 rubles a year, and afterward permitted him to reside at Samarcand. After innumerable intrigues and internal dissensions the throne was again vacant, and the present Ameer was chosen in 1880, and has been very substantially supported by the British Government of India, under Lord Ripon, receiving from it a regular subsidy of £100,000 a year, with large gifts of artillery, rifles, and ammunition to improve his military force.

FRANZ ABT.

The Well-Known Musical Composer.

Franz Abt, whose death was recently announced by a cable dispatch, was born in 1819, and was, therefore, 66 years old. His parents intended him for the ministry, but having a passion for music, he chose that vocation. He was a prolific composer of songs, his compositions numbering between four and five hundred, the most popular of which is "When the Swallows Homeward Fly."

A HELPLESS MAN HELPED.

At Greencastle, Ind., an hour's ride from Indianapolis, lives Mr. D. I. Southard, a gentleman well known throughout Indiana, among other honorable positions which he holds is that of Trustee of the De Pauw University. Mr. Southard is a brother-in-law of Bishop Bowman, of the Methodist Episcopal church.

For many years Mr. Southard was a martyr to rheumatism in its most afflictive form, and in July, 1885, he was nearly helpless, and could move only with great pain. At that time Bishop Bowman, having seen how greatly the Rev. Mr. Kelly, of Indianapolis, had been relieved by the new remedy, Allenburys, brought Mr. Southard a bottle of the medicine, and advised him to try it.

Mr. Southard's experience, resulting from his trial of Allenburys, was thus stated at a public hearing. Bishop Bowman happened into visiting Mr. Southard at the time of the occurrence of the following interesting incident and the radical remedy by the medicine:

Said Mr. Southard: "I had for years been afflicted with rheumatic gout. My arms and legs were swollen, and the pain was more and more, I was unable to dress myself, or even to put on my stockings. My knees were drawn up, and I was a helpless invalid. I had begun to despair of relief, when Bishop Bowman brought me a bottle of Allenburys. I had not faith in it, but I was willing to try it, for I had taken so many medicines.

"I began to take the Allenburys first at second. At that time I was subject to nightly pain, in the joints of my feet, of a peculiar character. I broke out into a profuse perspiration, and was in a condition of relief. In a few hours more all my pain was gone, and I was able to turn in bed and move my joints as I had not been able to do for a long time. I was astonished, and might be, by any excess, that any medicine could have such effect. I was able to dress myself, and I was able to go to my chief pains and my life. Knowing the effect of the medicine, I was careful not to take cold, and to avoid the censorship of the stomach. The Allenburys only put an end to the pain, and I was able to resume my duties. The last telegraph to London. It says that the mission of Edhem Pasha, who has been here constantly since January last, was to find the British Government into a belief that Turkey was disposed to be on friendly terms with England and to seek and follow her advice in all unpleasant complications. Hobart Pasha whose former reputation as a gallant admiral of the British navy made him a valuable tool for this purpose, was sent to Edhem Pasha to strengthen the blind. Hobart Pasha was intoxicated with the delivery of certain presents to the Queen and Prince of Wales, accompanied by the customary assurances of distinguished consideration, etc., which may mean a great deal or nothing. All the time work of diplomacy was going on, Turkey was being drawn from direst to last by Edhem Pasha.

Worse than Firearms.

The editor of an Omaha paper, in commenting on several cases in that city where a cough syrup containing morphia, remarks that opiates, poisons, and narcotics are more dangerous than firearms. Should note this, and, furthermore, that different Boards of Health, after making careful analyses, have certified that the only purely vegetable preparation of this kind and one that is in every way harmless, prompt, and effective, is that Star Cough Cure. Mayor Lozier, of Hallsville, Texas, the Commissioner of Health have publicly endorsed this valuable discovery.

A Devil Fish One Hundred Feet Long.

Capt. Keane states that, when fishing on the Grand Bank, in latitude 44 degrees north, longitude 50 degrees west (approximately), he found floating at the surface near his vessel one of the large squid, the body of which, measured as accurately as it could be from a dory, was fifty feet long, while the tentacles, all of which were intact and uninjured, were longer than the body, making the entire length more than 100 feet. The tentacles were larger around than the body of a stout man. He cut the squid up and loaded about three dory-loads, probably about three tons' weight, and he estimates that there were at least one or two more load-loads which he left to float away. I had previously heard of fishermen finding pieces of tentacles, etc., which might belong to animals nearly or quite as large as the one above mentioned, but I have never before met with any one who has had the fortune to see the entire sack a king of mollusks. The above statement is the nearest approach to be of more than ordinary importance, since it enables us to form more accurate estimates of the maximum growth attained by these great "devil fish."—Letter to Prof. Baird, Fish Commissioner.

Alternately Shaken and Scorched

By the paroxysms of chills and fever, the wretched sufferer for whom quinine has been prescribed, essays in vain to exterminate the dreadful disease with that hurtful palliative, which at best only mitigates the violence of the ills, and constantly proves hostile injurious to the system. In order to effect a thorough cure of malarial fever, whether intermittent or remittent, it is needed the system impregnable against the assaults of malarial poison. That this result is brought about by Hostetter's Stomach Bitters is a fact so widely recognized in this and other malarial districts, that it needs no further comment. It is unnecessary; but were it either essential or desirable to do so, it may well be supposed that the testimony corroborative of its claims, which has been published for years, would be thought by most, even sufficient proofs upon which to base a conclusion. Moreover, it is quite simple.

Broken-Hearted.

A man bought, by weight, a turkey from an old negro. When he took the bird home he found it contained only six pounds of lead in the cavity reserved for oysters. Indignant at such an outrage, he sought the negro and exclaimed:

"Look here, you old thief, what did you mean——"

"Dont say nuffin, boss. I'se broken-hearted."

"What's the matter wid you?"

"Dat turkey done broke my liber."

"I'm sorry for that."

"Oh, it's awful, sah! Ah! Lawd, what's goin' to come o' my po' chillun?"

Coughs, Colds, Croup, Consumption, and Remedy.

Of all the multitude of fearful ills that prey upon and destroy the human race, consumption stands out with distinctive prominence as the most alarming. A cold at first, then a neglected cough leads to the development of the insidious disease, and the remedy that has survived the test of years, that is Allen's Lung Balsam, compounded from the purest ingredients and free from all constipation or opium, for cough, colds, croup, bronchitis, and all other affections of the throat and lungs it stands unrivaled. It approaches so nearly a specific that, with the common sense of a dollar around each bottle strictly complied with, nine-tenths of the cases of consumptive cases are permanently cured by this invaluable remedy. The safety of every family would be consulted by keeping a bottle of Allen's Lung Balsam in the house and have it ready for use when coughs, colds, and croup make their unwelcome intrusion.

Nervous Debilitation.

The cases which are being made by Drs. Starkey & Palen, 1107 Girard street, Philadelphia, in consumption, catarrh, bronchitis, bronchitis, rheumatism, and all chronic diseases, are astonishing, and are united from our correspondence. If you are a sufferer from any disease which your physician has failed to cure, write for information about this Treatment.

"Tools Rush In, Where Angels Fear to Tread."

So impetuous youth is often given to folly and indiscretions; and, as a result, nervous, spinal, and organic debility follows, unless it is checked, self confidence is lacking; at night bad dreams occur, premature old age comes setting in, pain is in the trunk, in consequence. Young men should write to Dr. R. V. Pierce, of Buffalo, N. Y., the author of a treatise on the diseases of that class of weaknesses, and describing your case, to be sent free and without you full particulars by mail.

A FRIEND thinks that the whole annoyed unfortunate has because they did forget—Boston Transcript.

HOP FRENCH Brandy, Sweet Wood, Jamaica Ginger, and Camphor Water, as combined in Dr. Pierce's Extract Quart Wood, is the best remedy for colds, coughs, sore throat, sciatica, dysentery or bloody flux; also, for bruises, sprains, and health monitory sickness, if used early.

"Never but the brave deserve the fair," remarked the gambler, boldly pocketing the unregistered nickels.—Life.

should not be neglected. Brown's Bronchial Troches are a simple remedy, and very prompt relief. Cts. a box.

A Hundred Years might be spent in search of a remedy for Catarrh, cold in the Head and Hay Fever, when the equal of Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy was applied with the finger. Being pleasant and inoffensive, the cure of all disputes and, if it fails it is magical. It relieves at once and cures many cases with bad symptoms. Price 50 cents at druggists. 50 cents by mail. Dr. Sage, Buffalo, N. Y.

MESSMAN'S PEPTONIZED BEEF TONIC, the best preparation of beef containing its entire nutritious properties. It contains blood-making, strengthening, and life-sustaining properties; in addition to its value as a tonic, it is a most nourishing food, and all forms of debility, nervous prostration, wasting diseases, loss of appetite, convalescence, nervous prostration, overwork, or acute diseases particularly if resulting from pulmonary complaints. Elsewhere, Hazard & Co., proprietors, New York. Sold by druggists.

CATARRHAL HEADACHE.

I Think Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy is the best remedy for catarrh I have ever used. I never took anything which relieved so quickly, and I have not felt so well for years. I used two bottles of it, and it cured me. I used it three times a week, but since using the first bottle the disease with that hurtful palliative, which at best only mitigates the violence of the ills, and constantly proves hostile injurious to the system. In order to effect a thorough cure of malarial fever, whether intermittent or remittent, it is needed the system impregnable against the assaults of malarial poison. That this result is brought about by Hostetter's Stomach Bitters is a fact so widely recognized in this and other malarial districts, that it needs no further comment. It is unnecessary; but were it either essential or desirable to do so, it may well be supposed that the testimony corroborative of its claims, which has been published for years, would be thought by most, even sufficient proofs upon which to base a conclusion. Moreover, it is quite simple.

Broken-Hearted.

A man bought, by weight, a turkey from an old negro. When he took the bird home he found it contained only six pounds of lead in the cavity reserved for oysters. Indignant at such an outrage, he sought the negro and exclaimed:

"Look here, you old thief, what did you mean——"

"Dont say nuffin, boss. I'se broken-hearted."

"What's the matter wid you?"

"Dat turkey done broke my liber."

"I'm sorry for that."

"Oh, it's awful, sah! Ah! Lawd, what's goin' to come o' my po' chillun?"

The gentleman went out, and the negro said: "I didn't make no much difference blame shot. Cos no ten cents er twenty cents ain't gwine to make my harder ter git erlong wid every day."—Arkansaw Traveler.

For Good Purposes.

Mrs. A. M. Dunphy, of 1020 Hoke Ave., Philadelphia, is well known to the ladies of that city from the great good she has done by means of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound. She writes Mrs. Pinkham of a recent interesting case: "A young married lady came to me suffering with a severe case of Prolapsus and Ulceration. She commenced taking the Compound, and in two months was quite restored. In spite of this she took great delight in an interesting court case. Influenced by foolish friends, she attempted to evade the responsibilities of motherhood. After two or twelve days she came to me again, and she was indeed in a most alarming state and suffered terribly. I gave her a teaspoonful of the compound every hour for eight hours until she fell asleep; she awoke much relieved and vastly better. She continued taking the Compound, and in due season she became the mother of a fine healthy boy. But for the timely use of the medicine she believes her life would have been lost."

A PLEASANT LETTER.

Mr. William W. Chadwick, of Hatchville, Gosnold, writes under date of March 14, 1885, to Dr. Kennedy to say that the use of "Kennedy's Favorite Remedy" has cured him of Gall Stone, from which he had experienced great suffering for a long time. Mr. Chadwick felt wholly cured when he wrote, and says: "I have taken your medicine six months and have also regained my flesh and feel like a different man. I recommend Kennedy's Favorite Remedy to any one suffering from a Deranged Liver." Grateful testimonials come to Dr. Kennedy in quite in receipt of letters from them, expressing similar sentiments. These letters are spontaneous and put in all varieties of phraseology, but invariably setting forth one thing—the value of "Kennedy's Favorite Remedy" for many forms of disease. It may be just the thing you have been looking for. In your over discouraged. Have you Disappointed of the Kidneys or Bladder associated with Constipation of the Bowels? A Noteworthy Incident.

A young gentleman of sincere character, a member of the church of which I am pastor, gave me the following experience:

He said that, to the best of his knowledge, not a drop of any sort of intoxicating liquor had ever passed his lips. He knew it had not, so far back as he can remember in his childhood. He has, therefore, no temptation to drink—from either a strong habit or a love for the taste of wines or other liquors—and yet he maintains a daily warfare with the appetite. He has never passed a saloon without a strong inclination to enter. He has to rein himself up, and draw himself away, not to enter and take his first drink. This is not an occasional or spasmodic feeling; it is the one regular daily conflict of his life.

My friend gave graphic descriptions of one or two such pitched battles, when the desire became almost strong enough to overpower his will.

I did not ask him about his father, but I did say to him: "Was your grand father addicted to drinking?"

He said: "No; neither he nor my father; but my great grandfather was an habitual drunkard."

I desire the young men who may be among my readers to ponder these facts, not in the light of religion, but under the illumination of science. Observations, scientifically conducted, have demonstrated the doctrines of heredity, pointed out in the Bible. Hereditary traits often leap a generation. An insane man's son may be perfectly sane, and the insanity break out in his grandson. In the crossings of marriage that tendency to insanity may be weakened, and bye and bye entirely disappear, just as any taint or stain in the blood may be largely purged out in the course of generations where marriages bring better blood into the family.

Setting aside all the teachings of the sacred scriptures, with all other ethical considerations, one's thought of such love should keep one in purity of living not simply for one's own sake, but for the sake of those for whose existence in the world he is responsible.

I ask the young men among my readers to go back and ponder the experience of my friend. Upon reflection I am inclined to think that it is extraordinary only in the perfect resistance which he has made to his strong inclination, up to this date. There are probably tens of thousands who, under other circumstances, have fallen. Nothing is more absurdly against the truth of history than the statement that "such a man is only his own enemy."—Rev. C. F. Deems.

Temperance in War.

England's great military commander, Lord Wolseley, now entrusted with the Egyptian campaign, referring to his successful Red River Expedition, writes as follows:—During the thirteen weeks which elapsed between the disembarkation at Prince Arthur's landing, and our marching into Fort Garry, it rained upon forty-five days, and upon many occasions every one was wet for days together. Notwithstanding the magnitude of the labor, the exposure to inclement weather, and the great annoyance from mosquitoes thus endured, there was not throughout the whole of this arduous operation the least murmur of discontent heard from any one. From first to last there was a total absence of crime, and I may add, of sickness also. Never has any body of men on active service been more cheerful or more healthy. This has been since the few military expeditions where spirits have formed no part of the daily ration, and where no intoxicating liquor was obtainable. I consider that the above-mentioned happy results are in a great measure to be attributed to this fact. A large ration of tea was issued instead, and I found that the men worked better upon it than I have ever seen soldiers do upon any previous occasions where rum formed part of their daily allowance.

MISCELLANEOUS.

A Nogales (Arizona) dispatch says: A recent arrival from Sonora says that fighting has occurred between Yaqui Indians and Mexicans, and that the latter were defeated, with a loss of ninety killed and wounded. In Hermosillo and Magdalena every man who has not fled has been drafted. It is reported that many Mexicans from neighboring Mexican States are joining the Yaquis.

The engagement between Riel's and Gen. Middleton's forces at Fish Creek resulted in a Canadian loss of twelve killed and forty-seven wounded. Dispatches of April 27 stated that Gen. Middleton's position was regarded as critical, and that he would not advance until he receives reinforcements, which could not reach him before to-day.

Many thrilling incidents occurred during the recent engagement, says a Winnipeg dispatch. A Capt. Wm. Middleton's son, had three bullets shot from under him, and got a wound in the arm. The man who shot him was a half-breed, who was shot by a comrade, who killed a number of the men. He was a magnificent shot. The shooting of the rebels was very deadly. They had to shoot a man out, firing when they saw the men put up their heads to fire. Then kill a man through the head, and most of those wounded had seen stunk in the arm or chest.

Advices showed the average instance at Pittsburgh and Chicago are really a difference of $8.20 per ton in favor of the Western mills.

"Gen. Grant apparently continues to improve," says a New York dispatch of the 28th inst. "The excessive pressure of the throat, from which disease have been sloughed off, have materially improved. The numerous tumors at the base of the tongue are simply quiescent. Meantime the general condition is improved. The General has so far improved physically that he asked to become up engaged with the blocking out of his work upon his book. He recognizes nothing but he felt better, and was hardly and cheerfully throughout the day, spending some time in looking over the unfinished manuscript of his book."

The Russian Gen. Komaroff has sent a reply to the dispatch of Sir Peter Lumsden, the British commander, stating the necessary of Gen. Komaroff's repeal of the battle on March 30, on the Kushk River, between the Russians and Afghans. Gen. Komaroff admits that he had received an order from the Russian War Office, previous to the battle, not to occupy Penjdeh, but says that the other officers on the frontier had not yet been advised of the receipt of such an order. Referring to the alleged advance of the Russian troops previous to the fight, he says that only a company of Turcomans had advanced toward Penjdeh, but they had no intention of attacking the Afghans, and withdrew when the latter approached them in a hostile attitude. Gen. Komaroff concludes his former assertion regarding the authority and arrangement of the Afghans, their daily drawing nearer to the Russian camp, their occupation of a commanding position on the left bank of the camp, and other events which led up to the battle.

ULYSSES S. GRANT.

Celebrating the Sixty-third Anniversary of the Great Commander's Birth.

Gen. U. S. Grant was sixty-three years old on Monday, the 27th of April, and the anniversary of his birth was celebrated in many cities and informally observed throughout the country. Flags were displayed, and cannon boomed as when his people celebrated his great victories during the war, or when they gathered in great crowds to welcome him on his return from his trip around the world. Thousands of congratulatory messages were sent to the old commander, and his mail was as all lips. The event was quietly observed by the family of the stricken General at their home in New York.

Gen. Grant's Family.

It is a curious fact that the General had his wife, former Miss Dent, never had a child. Of the four that blessed their union but two survive, and have been with him throughout his dangerous illness. They are Col. Fred Dent Grant, aged 41, and Jesse Grant, younger, who is but 21. The eldest is married, and all his children are dead. The second son, Jesse Grant, married Miss Sarlotte, Dr. and Mrs. Sartoris's daughter, who is but 21. Of the children married, and all have died except one, Col. Fred Grant married Miss Honore, of Chicago, in 1881 or 1882. They have two living children, a little girl of 5, Julia, and a little boy, who bears the name of his grandfather, U. S. Grant. Ulysses S., Jr., married, in 1885, Miss Cadwalader, a daughter of the Senator. They have two children, one a boy and the other a girl. Jesse R. Grant married Miss Chapman, of San Francisco, within three months of the marriage of his brother, U. S., Jr., to Miss Honore. Jesse has a charming little, daughter about 3 years of age. Mrs. Sartoris has three children, the eldest, a boy of 9, is named Algernon after the famous poet. The children are a little girl of 6 and the "baby," a strong, healthy child, 2 years old. The young lad of the Grants succeeded itself in the third generation. For they all have the manly physique of the General's family.

Three Score and Three.

Three score and three!
The allotted span
The mighty Hunter has run
Through the forest of life, and the sands of time
Have run
Three score and three!
Three score and three!
The bitter fight is fought
The victory won
The weary soldier lays down his arms
Who gave the all. Now then dost give Homage to that God who gave him
And laid beard our prayers to save him.

Three score and three!
All wounds healed,
All scars healed, and all pain relieved over.
Three score and three!
Let the silent lips be heard
And the angel of love to day
Dropping her white hand on the sod
Redeemed by man and blessed of God
U. S. Grant, on Christ, our Lord.

BURIED ALIVE.

Frightful Result of a Snow-Slide in Colorado.

[Denver special.]

A telegram from Tomnostoro Pass says: A snow-slide occurred here and a snow-slide near that place in which eleven miners are supposed to have perished. The men were at work in a tunnel, and nothing having been heard of them for a fortnight, Frank Sanderson started out to ascertain if any harm had come to them. He found the tunnel, and, two miles from the entrance, he found the two miners buried, Sanderson found two men in a sleep snow-slide, that evidently came down in the dead of night. Not a sign of life was to be seen in any direction.

A special train from Leadville carried a relief party. Arriving at the point named the snow the party was met by a man who, on being hailed, was informed then that it was useless to attempt to reach the mine in the depth of the snow, even through the snowsheds, at that time of day. The men at the surveying party began work and found two bodies in the cabin. Two men were crushed to death by the snow-slide. The victims are Martin Borden and Joe Wheeler, of Denver, Frank Smith, W. Matthews and brother Jesse, of Iowa; John Lacy and John Burns, of England; Charles Richards, of New South; Chris Harvey, of Leadville; Robert Campbell and Fred Cliff, and John Burns, of San Francisco.

PREPARING FOR WAR.

England and Russia Making Extraordinary Preparations for the Impending Conflict.

A Statement that the Czar Fully Determined to Seize Herat—Talk of Neutrality.

The European war cloud grows darker day by day, and it seems almost certain that the hour and the hour will soon engage to a death grapple. Mr. Gladstone has given the world to understand that England will make no further concessions, and right on the heels of this comes the statement to Parliament, from the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs, that the Governor of Herat sends word that Russia has advanced upon Merurchak and is constructing a road to Herat, and the sixteen t is confirmed by news from Sir Peter Lumsden himself. It is also stated that the Czar has sent an ultimatum to Great Britain demanding that the latter shall accept Russia's proposed boundary line between Turkestan and Afghanistan, and that if Great Britain refuses to accept this boundary Russia will proceed to occupy Herat. Thus not only shows that Russia, while negotiating with Great Britain, has been moving her troops a long distance nearer to the Afghan capital of Herat, but that she has also invaded territory which is undoubtedly Afghan and which England has guaranteed to protect and protect. This is certainly an aggressive act, and if Russia has been guilty of it, certainly that Russia is actually moving on Herat. Merurchak is on the Kushk River, nearly twenty-five miles south of Penjdeh, and is nearly half that distance east of the boundary line as claimed by Russia herself. In a direct line it is only about 120 miles from Herat, with a level country all the way, and the pass in the Paropamisan Mountains is reached.

Preparing for the Conflict.

Meanwhile the war preparations being made by both powers are on a scale so large that when the clash of arms does come it will shake the whole of Europe. Russia has ordered the mobilization of her eastern army. It is thought that 90,000 soldiers can be made available to a war footing, and of her sailors has been ordered to the Black Sea. Russian ships have been purchased in France and England, and heavy guns have been ordered in Germany. The Czar has signed orders for the enlistment of 100,000 Cossacks, and some more are to be added to her reserve. Eleven vessels of the Canadian fleet have been ordered to the Pacific

Mrs. David Veitch, of Ironton, daughter of Mrs. Moerinonse, died at her mother's house on Monday night last of consumption. The funeral held at the M. E. church on Wednesday morning was very largely attended, Rev. C. F. VanAuken conducting the services. Much sympathy is felt for the bereaved family, this being the second bereavement in two years the same disease has carried their beloved husband, the dear time the father of deceased.

General Cameron requests the news papers of the 9th District to call attention to the fact that the naval cadet ship to which this District is entitled is still vacant, so that he would be glad at once to have from any young man, between the ages of 14 and 16 years, who wishes to be considered a candidate for the position. Candidates must be physically sound, of good moral character, and of a gentle of all commend to shoulders sufficient at least to stand two high school. Applications should be addressed to General Cameron at Manistee.—[Times.

D. C. Loveday & Co., of East Jordan, are refitting the building formerly occupied by Gerrue's saloon for a hardware store, and will commence moving their stock this week. This change is made necessary, to accommodate their increasing business, as their old room was too small to carry the stock necessary. It will take place then next week their other interests on the dock, the handling of merchandise as well as ties, wood, bark, etc. The dock and his back several rails are covered with immense piles of ties awaiting shipment, which will be moved forward as cars over a portable track.

Concerning the summer arrangement of Hannah, Lay & Co.'s steamers, the Petoskey Democrat says: The steamers Grand Rapids and U. S. Faxton will run the coming season a little differently than heretofore. The Faxton will leave here every morning and the Grand Rapids leave Traverse City at the same time, returning each day, so that there will be two round trips every day—Sundays excepted between here and Traverse City. Mr. Geo. E. Hanneh will be the general manager of the line, with headquarters at this village. The boat leaving here on Wednesday morning will connect with the City of Traverse at Traverse City for Chicago, arriving Saturday morning; face from Petoskey $5. The City of Grand Rapids will begin her trips on Monday, May 11th, the Faxton as soon as the squaws on her are completed. The city of Traverse will leave Chicago Saturday, May 9th on her first trip."

A circular letter issued to the supervisors and assessors of Michigan by Harry A. Cooper, Secretary of State, calls attention to the act providing for the registration of births, marriages and deaths. Such registration must be made the present year between April 10 and June 1, and the returns must be made to County Clerk on or before the last named date. Great importance is attached to having the returns made out correctly, as upon this depends their value. Whether any births and deaths have occurred is not, the law requires the report to be made to the Clerk. The Christian names of children reported in 1883, to which names were not given at the time, must be reported in the list for 1884. Color or race should be specified as white, black, Indian, white and Indian, Chinese, etc., and not simply as "African" or "Colored." Many causes of deaths reported heretofore have not been sufficiently definite to be of any service whatever, therefore accurate instructions are given under this head to obtain more explicit information regarding the diseases. The occupation should be stated in all cases, and for laborers and Supervisors and assessors should also ascertain, or distinguish, cases of insane, idiotic, or deaf and dumb persons. Especially desirable concerning these cases is the asylum for the insane and in other cases and many instances.

The First Boat.

The first arrival at Charlevoix in 1884, was the Kitty Spencer, April 15; in 1885 the Thomas Friant, May 6. The first steamers in 1884 were the Harrison and Sea Gem together; in 1885, the Morningstar, with 3,500 in board lumber.

The first launch from our yards this spring was the North Star, which boat also made the first trip up Pine lake.

The first steamer to reach East Jordan in 1884 was the Clara Belle, April 28; in 1885 the Clara Belle, on May 3.

The first tug to take a tow this this spring was the L. S. Payne.

The Operatic.

A small audience witnessed the opera house on Tuesday night to witness the performance of Red Fedora, and know the reason and why. Those who did received an entertaining entertainment. The performance of the Fate Fedora would that could be expected. The parts in the Chicago, Whitehall, Muskegon, and Traverse South were especially well rendered, and received much praise throughout for amateur performances of merit and ease of action. The parts as taken by Miss Ed. Hankins, Bertie Wood, Clara Alger, Arth Kearns, and Master Clarence Sherwood, also gave excellent satisfaction. Fred Morris as the Count had very much of the action and appearance of a solid account, and was much praised complimented. Some of the children were exceedingly bright and, but Willie Lewis deserved much attention by appearing on the scene as Cupid. Rinks—some of the decorations, Miss Flora Allison appointed a little encouragement, but for not was very well carried out. The "Gondolier" was always on the spot. Miss Ed Carpenter was excellent, and Mr. Smith's solos were usually well rendered. Miss Mosier and Mr. Moore shall to manage an entertainment of this kind. It will be repeated on Saturday evening, when a supper will be served from 5 to 7:30, commencing at 7:30.

The Governor's Old Friends.

Gov. Porter, of Indiana, tells a very funny story on himself, while lodging that for occasion his life he was dazed. During the recent campaign he went to a small town to make a speech. He began something in this way:

"My friends, I am glad to meet you again. I always like to come to Hamilton, and to see as I do now, so many old friends."

And from a tall, gaunt Hoosier, in a cocksure cap, erect out in an unmistakable voice:

"Name 'em, Governor, name 'em!"

And the Governor says he was so broken up by this outburst of inquiry for details that he could not name a man. The Hoosiers laughed good naturedly, and the Governor joined in, too. "Name 'em, Governor, name 'em!" has become a byword in Hoosier State.

THE OLD SONG.

BY OLIVER WENDELL HOMES.

The minstrel of the classic lay
Has fled with the winged sandal
And in his flight the fugitive ran astray
When he caught the rebel strange.

Of Cadmus he would fain have sung,
Of Atreus or Inc;
But all the journal printers rang
With some or love and wine.

Ah, brethren! I would fain have caught
Your fresher fancy's gleam,
My true accents find unbought,
The old familiar theme.

Love, Love! but not the assertive child
With shaft and bounding bow,
Whose random arrows strew the wild
Some three score years ago.

Not Eros, with his joyous laugh,
The sunlight in his curls!
Not Love, with mantling bowl and quaff
And quick, offended brow!

Our heads with frosted locks are white,
Our roses are blanched with snow,
Our hearts, in chilling winter's sadness,
Their Scania and heartbreaks glow.

Our old acquaintance, Time, drops in,
And while the reminiscence
Their golden threads unloosed spin,
He warms his frozen hands.

Stay, winged hours, too swift, too sweet,
And wait this message well!
To all we miss, from all we meet,
On life's fast crumbling sands:

Say that to old affection true
Our hearts, in spite of time,
Hold hands and hearts—alas, how few
The links that yet remain!

The latest touch awaits them all
That marks the ruin to dust;
Every year by year they break and fall—
They break, but never rust.

Say if one note of happier strain
Amid our sighs, half pleased,
One chord that vibrates, not in vain—
They memory but be chased.

Say that when Fancy closed her wings
And Youth's open door has late
Love, Love, still in heart from the strings
As from Anacreon's lyre.

A LEAP-YEAR PROPOSAL.

BY IRIS FONSONDY.

CHAPTER I.

"Hello, old fellow! Shall I see you at the grand ball masque? Grandest hop, and also the last one, of the season, you know. Better come."

"No—that is, I guess I can't come. Should like to, 'pon honor; but, pressing business, you know."

The two friends, so lately met, separated. The first speaker, Carl Du Quesne, a young and thriving barrister, but a few months from England, hurried to his club at the St. Frisco, while his old college chum, Frank Grealy, a lusty young lawyer who had but lately hung out his shingle, turned toward his unpretentious rooms at the Tycoon Hotel.

As he threaded his way along the narrow streets, lost in meditation, deep, profound, his thoughts ran thus:

"I don't know but I may drop in, after all, if but to look after my own character. Let me see (thrusting his hands in his pocket); this is honorary, sure enough. If I wasn't such an idiot to run whenever I see a pretty girl approaching, I might have found my destiny ere this. But, here we be."

The last exclamation was caused by finding himself in the center of a commodious room, where a huge fireplace sent forth a ruddy, pleasant glow.

"Deuce take it, where is my mercuchimo? I never even my cigar case when I'm thinking. Ideas my stars," he ejaculated, sharply, "if things don't seem a little mix—Jerusalem! but I'm in the wrong place."

Note enough; so lost in thought had he been that he had mistaken the number, and now was, horrible to relate, in an apartment occupied by a female, as the tasty oil paintings, and exhibition of musical skill here indicated. He flew around the room in a pitiful frenzy, in quest of a hat which would not appear, and was deliberating upon the consequences of leaving the room without that article, when a chorus of sweet girlish voices arrested his horrified senses, followed by peal upon peal of silvery laughter, drawing nearer every moment to the apartment in which he was standing.

"Good Lord, deliver me!" he cried out, mentally, as he stood for one moment motionless whether to risk all and fly past them, or run his chances of being undiscovered in some friendly retreat. He eagerly grasped at the latter probability, and made a dive for the only door in his rear, and which he found opened into a small dressing room literally hung with numerous garments in the feminine line.

Hastily drawing the door to after him, he was not a little disconcerted to hear as ominous click, while his "hair now stood on end" as he assured himself that he was a close prisoner, and at the mercy of the gay, fun-loving creatures just entering the apartment he had so lately quitted.

In vain he racked his brain for some plan of escape. In vain he listened for a signal of exit from the noisy, allconfiding group. As well might he have thought to enter from thence into an enchanted castle, and, having become invisible, return by passing through their made impervious.

At length, yielding himself to the inevitable, he crouched upon his knees at the key-hole, and prepared to take a complete survey of the entire group, the knowledge almost overwhelming in its great power, of beholding as much beauty unseen, and listening to fearfulness wit unblushingly.

He beheld a quartette of girls seated before the bright, rosy fender, with glowing, healthful cheeks and bright, sparkling eyes.

They were all chatting at once, and laughing inaudemately at one another's sallies.

Frank Grealy recollected having seen them all at a distance before to-night; but whether either of their names was Sally, Sue or Betsy Ann, he could not tell. He was soon set at rest, however, upon that subject.

The sanciest looking of the four—a dashing brunette of eighteen summers—after a coquettish toss of her ringlets, began:

"Alla Caswell, I say, whom do you purpose to invite to attend you on the occasion of the 29th? It should be some one highly gifted with the art of conversing nicely, you are such a quiet little puss, you know." And she pretty pinched one ear of the young girl sitting beside her.

"Indeed, I cannot say that I have decided to ask any gentleman as yet," was the reply, a bright blush suffusing the cheek of the timid speaker.

Frank Grealy, from his unenviable position, declared, mentally, that he had never seen a being half so lovely, "form in his idealistic dreams," as the little golden-haired, blue-eyed fairy named Alla Caswell.

"Oh, fie! cos! You should run and hide your face for shame, and thirteen years!" exclaimed bright, merry Alice Caswell, Alla's own cousin on her father's side of the family.

"I did not think that you were so cowardly, Alice," said Grace Dalrymple, sweetly. "Here have we all thrown our candidates, while you, little jealed one, are then and." Poor, timid darling."

This was more than the sensitive girl could endure quietly, and after listening a fiery glance of indignation upon the last speaker she responded, impulsively:

"I am not certain that I am compelled to select from a set which I could not, and as for being coward, I had much rather be called that than to be called a fool. But forgive me, dear," she suddenly exclaimed, noting by chance the expression of wounded pride and shocked surprise upon her friend's face. "I did not mean to wound you by my thoughtless words; I have been calculating all the time to choose some one of my gentlemen friends, but am so stupid that I really cannot make up my mind as to whom it shall be. And then, you know, if I should need with a refusal I should die of shame—I know I should. Please help me, girls."

Tears now actually shone in the candid, soulful eye of the pretty blonde, while any ill-will felt toward her on account of those few hasty words vanished from the hearts of her three friends like magic.

"Indeed, we will try to help you," chorused the three, eagerly.

"The first step taken, then, should be to have her into the secret of the names of our escorts, I think," said Grace Dalrymple, brightly.

"Well, mine," began Cora Beaufort, the dashing brunette and first speaker, "is Charlie St. Maur. He is the only one I asked," she added, conceitedly.

"I do not see why I may drop in, at once, either," said Alice Caswell, a little defiantly. "And the one I selected to be my partner is Mr. Cassell."

"Why, indeed," was the general response.

Alla, the young lady in question was mute.

"Why don't you thank us for helping you in your selection, Alla?" asked Grace, with a becoming pout of her cherry lips.

"I scarcely think I dare!" was the blushing answer.

"She expects us to pop the question for her, girls," exclaimed Alice, with a merry little laugh.

"Oh, goodness me! He would jump completely out of his—his—office window, and make straight for the river," said Cora Beaufort, arising to her feet and executing a charming little pirouette upon one daintily buttoned boot.

"I will ask him myself, thank you," responded Alla Caswell, drawing her little form to its full height.

"Good gracious, Alla Caswell! Whatever can you mean? You will pop the question yourself, will you? I'm sure I'd wager you a new hat that you dare not."

"You are too bad, girls," exclaimed Alla, beginning to cry with vexation.

"Oh, Alla, I pray you only would!" exclaimed Grace and Alice in chorus.

"Yes, come! Do promise that you will, and we will never ever tell that it was you. You can disguise your voice tolerably, and if for the rest, why you will be masked, you know," said Cora, pleasingly.

Fearing ridicule from her friends if she refused, and perceiving no real harm in connection with it, she finally consented to perform the most foolish act in her life, as she declared to herself afterward.

"Oh, you dear darling, you!"

"You blessed lamb!"

"Oh, Alla! you are just too sw——"

"What was that?" exclaimed all, in a startled whisper, as a distinct noise of some kind was heard to proceed from the wall in their rear.

The unlucky prisoner, in his affright at the prospect of such a direful catastrophe as was threatened by the mischievous plotters, had ceased to be as motionless as a statue, and in his effort to turn around the toe of one boot came in contact with a panel of the door, causing the exclamation above referred to.

"Oh, I dare say a rat has worked his way into the closet, and has upset my work-basket, or something," explained Grace Dalrymple.

"A rat! good gracious! Who dare open the door to see? I shall faint upon a chair or the table. I promise you!" exclaimed timid Alla, suiting the action to the word by mounting a stool, preparatory to making a higher ascension.

"I will, goosie!" responded Cora Beaufort bravely, tragically flourishing the poker which she had previously armed herself with.

"No, no!"

"You surely would not commit so reckless an act?"

"You will frighten us all into hysteria, you wayward girl!" were the remonstrances uttered.

"I lead; who will follow?" said she as she moved toward the fatal depredator.

She cautiously turned the key, and, with a quick, decisive jerk, flung the door wide open to the wall.

The girls all looked with one accord, toward the small room now fearfully posed to their wondering, terrified gaze.

The glimpse of a pair of masculine feet was sufficient for all four, and without one backward glance they all ran, shrieking, and almost fainting, through the hall, from thence down the steps and out into the friendly open air; while Frank Grealy, now enabled to indulge his feelings to the utmost, speedily clapped his recovered hat upon his head and entered his room, where a terrific explosion ensued.

CHAPTER II.

"Come to my arms, my dear one!
Alla is well in Lethe nothing."

"Better come to the party, Frank, old boy! All the elite of the land will be there; you will forever regret it if you don't. Where! I say, Frank, I think it becomes some fair dames has not taken pity upon you to invite you? If so, go ask some one of the beautiful maidens to accompany you. Go, by all means."

"Don't bother your cranium about me," he said, with a merry twinkle in his eye. "My fair companion for the ball masque is decided upon and, besides, I have a pressing engagement across the ocean. So, all right, old fellow!"

The rooms for the scene of disappointment presented an earthly Eden of beauty and delicious perfume exhaled from numerous tropic plants to the senses was intoxicating in the extreme.

Embracing music preceded from a contiguous alcove, where skillful musicians were stationed.

Deliciously cool, softly lighted retreats, surprised the explorer among every hand, ornamented by a splashing fount, from whose mouth of dance white and cedar were placed here and there, while tropic vines of the same adorned the paintings suspended from the wall.

At the entrance of the masqueraders the music struck up in a lively march, which continued until the last one had arrived.

Then all was lively chatter and general curiosity, each one striving to discover the identity of others.

The dancing was at its height. The "Beautiful Blue Danube" and other waltzes from Strauss were being execrably rendered, and floated in all their melodious strength of enticing rapture out upon the still night air.

In a small alcove, resting from the fatigues of the last dance, sat Alla, seated on a cozy tete-a-tete, painfully silent.

The lady, in her disguise as a flower-girl, appeared graceful and charmingly petite in the costume which she had chosen. The gentleman, as a French courier, appeared to advantage, his tall, commanding figure signally adapted to the representation. Screened from view by the folds of the heavy damask curtains, which effectually shut out the window seat in this embrasure from the interior, were huddled three feminine forms bent on eavesdropping.

"Is not that music entrancing, pet?" was the courteous query which broke the lengthening silence.

"Yes, it is beautiful!" was the response, in a low, vexed tone. "Shall we join the waltzers, sir?"

"Not without you particularly wish it," he replied, politely.

"When should she have a fitting opportunity to keep her promise to thus leaving girls, and relieve her mind of a weight which would persist in continuing to lay heavily upon her shoulders she might do?" This was the question which Alla Caswell asked herself as she sat twirling a small circle upon her finger, while listening apparently to the charming Stranger.

"I will soon have it done with, and then I am away somewhere where no one may find me," she soliloquized.

"A penny for your thoughts, fair lady!" come the dear, musical voice beside her.

"Dreaming!" was the time of the disguise which concealed her features, and lurking somewhat in the very necessary requirement, self-confidence, Alla buried her face in her hands to hide its crimson hue, and well knew that, from "Whatever is the matter, Alla—Miss Caswell?" asked the concerned chevalier, oblivious of prudence for the moment.

"I—that is—how did you know my name is Miss Caswell?" queried poor Alla, striving in vain to appear dignified and angry.

"Hush! do not draw needless attention. Let us come to an understanding. Is there not some question which you desired my answer to, to-night? Nay, do not deny that there is, for I know all about it."

"You—you know! impossible," ejaculated Alla, strangely pale lips.

"Nay. Now sit down here, dear Miss Caswell—Alla, if I may call you by that dear title—and let me suggest to you a mode of silencing forever the teasing of those meddling girls in regard to this evening."

And he popped the question, then and there.

An ominous silence ensued. A slight movement of the heavy damask curtains which shaded the window failed to attract their attention, while silence for a time reigned supreme.

"I do not know! Indeed, I cannot think now. Please, oh, please, Mr. Grealy, take me home," she pleaded. Her head whirled and she felt dizzy and ill.

The next day Frank Grealy was seen by Mrs. Grundy departing from the Caswell mansion with a look of triumphant happiness glorifying his fine features, while, strange to say, his customs bachelorhood had in a great measure fled.

Wedding cards in a few months were circulating; sure harbingers of a very unique future.

Now, after the wedding the three young ladies of our acquaintance not the fairest the appearance of the bride upon that occasion, and of Alla in general.

"Well, now what do you think of leap-year proposals, Grace Dalrymple?" asked Cora Beaufort, resting her chin in one hand, while beating a restless tattoo upon the carpet.

"Why, I think, as most people would under the circumstances, that Alla Caswell did uncommonly well," was the laughing rejoinder.

"Go then and do likewise, Alice!" said Cora Beaufort, clinking her friend teasingly under the chin.

"perhaps I might if she had not spoken so low about it, and failed to catch Alla's successful mode," she replied, pedantic.

"At all events, we shall have to wait our turn for four years, girls!"

A Lesson in Advertising.

The Lonesome Jersey sign-board, standing chin deep in the flood and over the rain, warning people not to have a picnic on the island and leave dresses that afternoon, brought to my mind a long, dreary, dismal November day I once passed—how I passed it, is only a merciful Providence knows—in Cuxton, N. J., where I happened to get quite so large as the Eagle business office. It rained all day long. I got up about daylight to rain and kept on raining all day long. I went to bed to wait all day long for the train to come in. In the afternoon, when my letters were all answered, I took a newspaper work was accomplished, I stood at the window and looked doldrifts out on the flooded landscape. The trees stood knee deep in the water. Everything was soaked. Everything drip, drip, dripped. Whatever could float floated. What could not float was Water, water everywhere. In the clouds, in the air, on the ground, drip, gurgle, splash, drop and trickle, water, water, torrent. And right in all this miserable moisture a great big sign, painted in white letters, black shaded, on a board fence, a sign so big that you could read it half a mile away, and so near that in the face even when I shut my eyes and tried to get it out of my mind. It read: "Hatch's Hair Restorer."

Now, who the mischief wanted any of my kind of water on a day like this? It made me so mad that I tried to quit looking at it. But I couldn't. If I crawled under the bed, it was there; if I turned my head into the pillow, it stared down the chimney. By and by, in utter despair, completely knocked out and overwhelmed, I yielded to my fate, went out in the rain, went right straight to Hatch's and drank a glass of Hethesia water, and if there was anything in the world I hated, it was Hethesia water.

As a newspaper man I could only draw one moral from this: "Persistent advertising will tell."—Burlette, in Brooklyn Eagle.

Ages of Authors.

Authors are proverbially a long-lived race, but there are many exceptions to the rule. Chatterton, Keats and Kirke White died in early manhood. Keats was only 25; Artemus Ward died at 31; Byron at 36; Burns at 37; Charlotte Brontë at 39; Edgar Allan Poe at 40; Goldsmith at 46; Hazlitt at 52; Mrs. H. Browning, Shakspeare, and Thackeray at 52; Charles Kingsley at 56; Dickens at 58; Hawthorne at 59; Scott at 61; Roscoe at 62; Milton and Spencer at 66; Dumas senior at 67; Balzac at 68; Hans Anderson at 70; Chaucer at 72; De Quincey at 74; Samuel Johnson at 75; Irving at 76; Bernager at 77; Goethe, at 83, lived through three generations.

It is a common mistake to assume that Australia is a country destitute of large rivers; on the contrary, it possesses one of the largest water courses in the world, viz., the Darling, which is navigable for 2,345 miles, placing it third in rank among the rivers of the world, estimated by their navigable length, and considerably above the Nile, navigable for 1,900 miles; the Danube, 1,700; and the Lisamas, navigable for only 188 miles.—Toronto Globe.

The Liquor Curse.

Virtues go in families. One of these family groups is "faith, hope, charity;" another is "long suffering, gentleness, goodness;" another is "righteousness, peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost." The same is true of vices. "Filthiness, foolish talking and jesting" are classed together as if in close relationship. So are "bitterness, wrath, anger, clamor, evilspeaking and all malice;" and so are "adultery, fornication, uncleanness, lasciviousness, idolatry, witchcraft, hatred, variance, emulations, wrath, strife, seditions, heresies, envyings, murders, drunkenness, revellings and such like." We often hear of parent vices, and what vice is not the parent of a vile and various progeny of vices? What form of sin is not infinitely productive and reproductive? What crime does not lead to crime? What evil does not draw other evils in its train? What curse is not cumulative?

Certainly the liquor curse has roots and branches without number. Certainly the drinking saloon is one of the chief synagogues of Satan. It is not only that drunkenness is born and bred there; this is but the beginning of the evil wrought. The lowest and lowest passions are fired there; contention and strife spring up there and murder often does its bloody work there. Crime in all its forms rocks not in vain for hellish inspiration there; oaths and curses resound there; the whole vocabulary of profanity can be acquired there. Sabbath breaking finds its chief harbors there; and infidelity under all its forms gains numerous adherents there. The chief antagonism that the church finds throughout our land is there, with its scores of attendants where the church has its units, and there on the holy day and every day alike. The bartender is the most dangerous rival of the minister; and not only is he this, but he is also the rival and the adversary of every philanthropist, every moralist and every reformer. The awful business in which he is an actor-agent is a direct attack not only upon the church, but to the community; a curse to every home, and the friend of every loving heart that has a son, or husband, or lover, or friend exposed to its insidious temptations. The liquor traffic, whether conducted at retail or at wholesale, is a traffic in the peace and safety and prosperity of the people; and not only those who profit by it or who patronize it, but all who apologize for it, or palliate or excuse its atrocities are aiders and abettors in its spreading devastations.

God be thanked, the multiplied revelations of the results of this foul iniquity have so aroused the public conscience that "prohibition" is now becoming the temperance watchword everywhere. Arguments and apologies and excuses for an evil which has eaten like a cancer into the most vital interests of the family, the church and the community, are becoming more and more obnoxious to increasing multitudes. A radical reform in this matter seems to be approaching; a reform which, it is presumed, will rescue thousands from alcoholic temptation and from the fearful fate of the drunkard. God speed the day! —S. Corinne, D. D.

Temperance work is a brave good work for young people to engage in. A cause which sadly needs the helping hands is being surrounded with a halo of sweetness and light which will make it beautiful in the eyes of all who behold it. And the blessed truth is being exemplified in their lives that those who give strength shall themselves grow strong. —Ex.

A young man proposed for the hand of a beautiful girl. As she hesitated about replying, he said, "I want you to answer with baited breath." The girl, who is a good deal of a humorist, said, "Well, Mr. M., you well have to into your breath with something besides high wines to catch your humble servant. Good night."

The above is a geographically correct view (though containing but a small number of buildings) of Charlevoix, Mich., a village of over twelve hundred inhabitants, rapidly growing and maintaining as one of the most delightful Summer Resorts and ideal harbors in Lake Michigan. Several lines of steamers concentrate here, connecting small lines of railroad in surrounding towns, fishing stations, picnic parks, and other places of interest within pleasure. Unequaled inducements are also offered the permanent settler who contemplates a home in manufacturing enterprises, where it will bring the best results. The surrounding country (by actual test) is one of the most productive in Northern Michigan, being the richest farming country for miles around the village or surroundings, adjacent.

Percheron Horses.

AS we are informed from the great stock farms of exceedingly reputation and unfamed in the French and American stud books.

ISLAND HOME

is beautifully situated at the head of Lake Emmet in the Horse River, ten miles below the city of Petoskey, and is reached by daily stages. All familiar with the locality are aware of the beauty and fertility of Cross Village, and its great self-sustaining resources, which we will add, are unsurpassed by any other section of northern Michigan. Several thousand acres of land are cleared and under cultivation, and specially given over to the raising of hay, oats, potatoes, and other vegetables, including tobacco, which latter staple is now being cured in the barns. Send for illustrated catalogue, which will be mailed free, and which will show the importance and indisputable merit of your inquiry. Address, SAVAGE & FARNUM, Detroit, Mich.

OLD NEWSPAPERS FOR SALE

HIGH-PRICED HUMANITY.

She was ready for bed and by an my arm,
In her little frilled cap so fine,
With her golden hair falling out at the edge,
Like a circle of moon sunshine.
And I hummed the old tune of "Blueberry Cross,"
And "Three men who put out to sea,"
When she sleepily said, as she closed her blue eyes,
"Papa, fot would you take for me?"

And I answered, "A dollar, dear little heart,"
And she slept, baby-every with play,
But I held her warm in my love-strong arms,
And rocked her, and rocked away.
O, the dollar meant all the world to me,
The land and the sea and sky,
The lowest depth of the lowest place,
The highest of all that's high.

The cities with steeples and palaces,
Their pictures and stores of art,
I would not take for one low, soft throb
Of my little one's loving heart.
Nor all the gold that was ever found
In the busy, wealth-finding past
Would I take for one smile of my darling's face
Did I know it must be the last.

So I rocked my baby and rocked away,
And I felt such a sweet content,
For the wonder of the song expressed to me more
Than they ever before had meant.
And the night crept on and I slept and dreamed
Of things far too glad to be,
And I awakened with lips saying close to my ear,
"Papa, fot would you take for me?"

Starved Into Submission.

It is a singular fact that the only industries in this country in which men can be literally starved into submission are those commonly known as protected. When miners, carpenters, street car employes, railroad men, or others not in any way protected by the tariff strike for more pay or against a reduction they either succeed, go to work just as well fed as ever after weeks at their employers' terms, or leave the country and seek occupation elsewhere. It is not so with the tariff protected coal miners. When they strike they are usually starved into submission. That is the proper name for it. The companies win by starving their men and their families.

The sorrowful results of these strikes are announced in a telegram of three or four lines, as was the conclusion of the lockout at Seet Haven, Pa., this week. Fifteen hundred men at that place were compelled to work at the figures proposed or starve to death, and seeing no escape they signed the contract imposed upon them.

Many devices are resorted to to make the star vation process effectous. Combinations are formed against the strikers. Living in houses owned by their employers, they are thrust into the street. Being dependent upon stores owned by their employers, they are refused credit there, and, not having access to other traders, they are helpless. It does not take long to reduce men thus situated to despair, to make their children cry for bread, or to bring upon them all the miseries of a famine. When it is considered that these people are so abjectly poor to begin with that such a thing as moving to a new place is out of the question, a pretty clear idea of the helpfulness of the tariff protected laborers of the country may be gained. A tree is known by its fruit. The tariff tree brings forth no other fruit than this so far as the laborer is concerned.

The world may be challenged to produce a wretchedness greater than that which exists among the Eastern coal miners during the greater part of the year. Though they are the men whom the paid organs of the tariff monopoly assert that the protective policy enriches, enables and dignifies, Protection is a crime fortified by falsehood.—(Chicago Herald.

Deer Hunting in Yucatan.

Deer abound in the neighborhood of Abaiis. In hunting them several men place themselves so as to form an extended circle, within shooting distance of each other. A few go within the circle and make as noisy disturbance sounds as they can summon to their lips, so as to frighten all living things under the brush. Startled, the game seeks safety in flight. Then the men near whom the game happens to pass shoot, sometimes wounding dangerously or killing a companion, particularly when, as on some occasions, the circle closes in to bring all the game to one spot. Owing to the danger incurred in the hunt, it has been prohibited, but the Indians are very loath to give up the customs of their ancestors, and in the villages no one interferes with them. Ten, twelve, and even more deer are caught at once; then the hunters cook them; otherwise the meat would not keep fresh until sold. The cooking is done in the following manner: A hole two or three feet deep is made in the ground, and large stones placed in the bottom; on them a fire is built. When the stones are very hot some are taken out. Plantain leaves are spread over those that remain, and the animal, having been stripped of its skin, is laid thereon. Other plantain leaves are put over it, then the hot stones that have been taken out, and over all, earth. In two or three hours the deer is thoroughly cooked and is very tender and juicy. The deerskin, when tanned is worth three or four dollars. It is used for making boots, large numbers being exported to the United States.—Alice D. le Plongeon, in Harper's Magazine for February.
